Bishop Paulose Mar Paulsoe prefers to call himself a "secular theologian" because he communicates the Christian faith in secular language. He received his Ph.D. from Princeton Theological Seminary for a dissertation on Bonhoeffer’s corrective of Karl Marx. He was a Bishop in the Chaldean Syrian Church in Kerala, India and served as President of the World Student Christian Federation. Published by Christava Sahitya Samithy (CSS), Tiruvalla-689 101, Kerala, S. India. This material was prepared for Religion Online by Ted and Winnie Brock.

(ENTIRE BOOK) A brilliant analysis of Bonhoeffer’s theology as a corrective of Karl Marx’s Critique of Religion.

Preface, by Bishop Yuhanon Mor Meletius
Bishop Dr. Paulose found several areas where Christianity and Marxism could cooperate for the creation of a new world order. He was critical of Christianity for preferring to keep the status quo intact and making people slaves to outdated dogmas, customs and practices that never addressed and represented the aspirations and struggles.

Introduction, by Ninan Koshy
The possibility of undergirding the positive criticisms of Marx with a sound theology is explored by Bishop Paulose. This exploration is in the nature of an analytical study of Bonhoeffer’s theology.

Chapter 1: Marx and Bonhoeffer on Religion
This study seeks to elaborate a Bonhoefferian corrective of Marx’s critique of religion. Whereas Marx completely abandoned the concept of God by his critique of religion, Bonhoeffer tried to reinterpret the concept of God so that it would be understandable to the autonomous modern person living in a "world come of age".

Chapter 2: The Continuity of Marx’s Thought
The question of continuity and discontinuity of Marx’s thought has been a major issue of debate in the study of Marxism and must be resolved or any study of Marxism will not be fruitful. Paulose holds the view that, despite a few minor variations, the ‘young’ and the ‘old’ Marx are essentially one and the same, and that there is a continuity of thought in Marx’s writings.

Chapter 3: Influence of Hegel and Feuerbach on Marx
Marx’s criticism of religion can only be understood against the background of Hegelian philosophy and also of the anthropology of Feuerbach, which it extends and supersedes.

Chapter 4: Marx’s Critique of Religion
A review of the religious influences Marx had as a child at home and during his school days. Some of the essays he wrote for his Abitur, the German school leaving examination, permit us to watch his later ideas being formed at an earlier age.

Chapter 5: Transcendence According to Marx
Theoretically Marx does not see the destruction of religion as an important aim. The disappearance of religion will be the normal outcome of rational thinking and rational living. Man’s ultimate task is to create a world in which authentic humanity is guaranteed and gradually achieved in the material, moral, cultural and intellectual spheres.

Chapter 6: Marx’s Critique of Religion as Challenge to Christianity
Marx’s critique of religion should be considered as a symbol of our lack of prophetic spirit. Since Marx directs his attacks on religion in the name of man, against the alienation of man from his own potentialities and purposes, it constitutes, for that reason, the greatest challenge to Christianity in our time.

Chapter 7: Bonhoeffer’s Concept of "World Come of Age"
By the phrase, "world come of age," Bonhoeffer means two things: 1. The large measure of control given man over nature by the discovery of the scientific method. 2. The awareness that the modern man is no longer under either the tutelage or the control of ‘god’, but is called to freedom and responsibility.

Chapter 8: Non-Religious Interpretation
Bonhoeffer developed his thinking with a firm belief in the Incarnation and the Cross, and consequently, in the potential of a renewed humanity. This belief led him to a wholehearted recognition of the world come of age, to a criticism of religion, and to an attempt to interpret Biblical and theological concepts in a non-religious language.

Chapter 9: Religionless Christianity
To interpret the fundamental message of the Gospel – faith in the incarnate, crucified and risen God -- to the man come of age was the mission of Bonhoeffer.
Chapter 10: Transcendence According To Bonhoeffer
An evaluation of the deeper dimensions of Marx’s critique of religion as these might be applied in the fulfillment of Marxist programme, and a theological evaluation of Marx’s critique of religion and how much the church can appropriate from this critique.

Chapter 11: Bonhoefferian Theology as Challenge to Marxism
A summary and an examination of the implications of Bonhoeffer’s theology for the church’s life today. How Bonhoefferian theology functions as a challenge to Marxist philosophy. Bonhoeffer reminds us that it is Christ, and Christ alone, who validates the world of responsible secular people. The meaning of the life of Jesus of Nazareth is that God and the world can no longer be separated.

Chapter 12: A Call For Dialogue
By examining Marx’s critique of religion optimistically and without prejudice we find that Marxists and Christians can agree, in spite of several disagreements, that both are ultimately concerned for true humanity, especially for the rights of the poor and needy, the hungry and hopeless; both could agree that they strive to be "true to the earth".

Viewed 1912 times.
Bishop Paulose Mar Paulsoe prefers to call himself a "secular theologian" because he communicates the Christian faith in secular language. He received his Ph.D. from Princeton Theological Seminary for a dissertation on Bonhoeffer’s corrective of Karl Marx. He was a Bishop in the Chaldean Syrian Church in Kerala, India and served as President of the World Student Christian Federation. Published by Christava Sahitya Samithy (CSS), Tiruvalla-689 101, Kerala, S. India. This material was prepared for Religion Online by Ted and Winnie Brock.

Preface, by Bishop Yuhanon Mor Meletius

Bishop Dr. Yuhanon Mor Meletius is the Secretary of the Bishop Dr. Paulose Mar Paulose Trust.

Nelson Mandela, the legendary figure in the history of South African freedom struggle wrote about Archbishop Desmond Tutu, "here was a man who inspired an entire nation with his words and his courage, who had revived the people’s hope during the darkest of times" (Long Walk to Freedom p. 678).

These words come to mind when one begins to write about Bishop Dr. Paulose Mar Paulose. He was a unique personality and a special kind of bishop who inspired many and revived the hopes of the people. He was less concerned about the dogmas and doctrines of the church that often only helped to torture Jesus by dividing his community than about the plight of millions of people in this very world which Jesus came to liberate. He was disturbed about the institutionalization of injustice in the name of religion and God. He believed in Jesus who liberates people from oppressive forces of this world in their social, political, economic and religious manifestations.

Bishop Dr. Mar Paulose was not a member of any political party. But he was politically more active than many a party worker. He believed that human beings are basically political beings, and hence should actively participate in political life. Through the political involvement of individuals and communities a free and just society should evolve. In this process, there is no ideology or community that should be ignored or excluded. He exhorted that those who believe in God should join forces with all those who struggle for justice because liberation from bondage is a common concern of humanity irrespective of religion or ideology.

It was in this context that he entered into very realistic dialogue and active participation with the Marxists who are considered by vast sections of Christians as anti-religious. Bishop Dr. Paulose found several areas where Christianity and Marxism could cooperate for the creation of a new world order. He was critical of Christianity for preferring to keep the status quo intact and making people slaves to outdated dogmas, customs and practices that never addressed and represented the aspirations and struggles. His studies on Marxism and its critiques along with Christian theology helped him formulate this position. He found Christianity silent at several crucial historical junctures where the message of liberation of Jesus was to be put into practice. He found the institutional Christian community most often insensitive towards the agony of people.

Bishop Dr. Paulose was a student in the US at the time of American military involvement in Vietnam. Berkeley the University where he studied was a centre of protest against this and large sections of American Christians were opposed to the war. The Bishop participated in the protests against the American policy in Vietnam. This was the same time when he was influenced by the humanism of Karl Marx and the "religionless Christianity" of Bonhoeffer. He was very much fascinated by the life and work of Bonhoeffer who was imprisoned and killed by Hitler for opposing Nazism. Bishop Paulose found in Bonhoeffer’s writings a corrective for Marx’s critique of religion. That became the subject of his doctoral dissertation which is a plea for Christian-Marxist dialogue.

Bishop Dr. Paulose Mar Paulose was born on September 14, 1941, at a place called Chirayathu in the suburb of Thrissur in Kerala, as the youngest of the five children of Konikkara Antony and Kochumariam. He did his schooling in the Chaldean Syrian High School and college studies at the St. Thomas College, Thrissur. Bishop Mar Paulose did his basic theological studies at Serampore College, West Bengal and later went to Princeton Theological Seminary for higher studies. He was awarded Ph.D. for his dissertation on "A Bonhoefferian Corrective of Karl Marx's Critique of Religion" form Berkeley Graduate Theological Union, California. He was ordained a deacon of the Chaldean Syrian Church in 1958 and in 1965 a priest in the Church. In 1968 he was elevated to the position of an episcopa (bishop).

When he came back to India after his studies in the States, he found himself in a situation where his principles were under test. Those were the days of the "Internal Emergency" imposed by Prime Minister Indira Gandhi. Bishop Paulose who was deeply concerned about civil liberties and other fundamental rights of citizens realized that the Emergency was an attempt to crush democracy by an authoritarian regime. He took a firm stand against the Emergency. All those who craved for freedom and justice found a new friend in the Bishop. Here was a different kind of Church dignitary. He was welcomed in many places where Christian clergy had failed to reach. He was looked upon by a lot of people, in the Church and society at large, who had no voice. He became their voice. He was a good friend of the working class, exploited, oppressed and marginalized. His sudden death at the age of 57 came as a shock to all those who knew him and left a void hard to fill.

Bishop Dr. Paulose was the Chairman of the Student Christian Movement, Kerala, for two terms. He served as the President of the Indian chapter of the Christian Peace Conference and as the Chairman of the World Student Christian Federation. He traveled widely and participated in several international conferences and symposiums. He was the Secretary of the Episcopal Synod of his Church when he died.

It has been a long cherished desire of many who respected him, including the late E.M.S. Namboodiripad, the guru of Indian Communism, to see his doctoral thesis published. After the demise of the Bishop, his friends and well wishers got together to form a trust called "Bishop Dr. Paulose Mar Paulose Trust, Thrissur", to continue the work the Bishop had begun. The Chaldean Syrian Church graciously entrusted the rights of the literary property of the Bishop with the Trust. The Trust has already published a few collections of Bishop Paulose's articles as books. Dr. Ninan Koshy, the Chairman of the Trust and a close associate of the Bishop, has done careful editorial work on the thesis for publication. He has also written the introduction to the book. The Trust is very grateful to the Christhava Sahithya Samithy, Thiruvalla for undertaking the publication of this book. We are confident that this publication will be of interest to a large number of people and will significantly contribute to Christian Marxist dialogue and cooperation.
Bishop Paulose Mar Paulose prefers to call himself a "secular theologian" because he communicates the Christian faith in secular language. He received his Ph.D. from Princeton Theological Seminary for a dissertation on Bonhoeffer’s corrective of Karl Marx. He was a Bishop in the Chaldean Syrian Church in Kerala, India and served as President of the World Student Christian Federation. Published by Christava Sahitya Samithy (CSS), Tiruvalla-689 101, Kerala, S. India. This material was prepared for Religion Online by Ted and Winnie Brock.

Introduction, by Ninan Koshy

Bishop Dr. Paulose Mar Paulose was a student of theology in Berkeley University in the United States at a time when Berkeley became well known as a campus of radical student protests. The demand of the students to the United States government to withdraw its forces from Vietnam and the protests around it influenced Bishop Paulose’s theological thinking. He was convinced that on certain occasions Christian obedience has to be shown through protest and resistance. He recalls in the introduction to his book in Malayalam, Swathanthriyam Anu Daivam ("Freedom is God") that it was when he was at Berkeley, that he was influenced by the humanism of Karl Marx and the "religionless Christianity” of the German theologian Dietrich Bonhoeffer. He was awarded doctoral degree in 1976 for the thesis "A Bonhoefferian Corrective of Karl Marx’s Critique of Religion. It was "submitted as a contribution to Marxist Christian dialogue which has in recent years been smothered by unfavourable international politics." It is "addressed primarily to the Christian community, but it is also hoped that it might invite the perspective of other groups."

This publication is an edited version of the thesis. We have taken every care to maintain fully the integrity of the thesis. Portions of the thesis which consist mainly of references to other authors and quotations from them have been omitted while ensuring the continuity of thought in the thesis. In the rest of the thesis we have made only minor editorial changes.

Three things this dissertation is not, Bishop Paulose makes clear. First, this is not an attempt to prove that Christian theology is superior to Marxist philosophy. Second, this is not an attempt to place Bonhoeffer in the Marxist camp. Third, this is not an attempt to make a synthesis of Marxism and Christianity. ‘Rather, Marx’s and Bonhoeffer’s critiques of religion are examined objectively, and the possibility of undergirding the positive criticisms of Marx with a sound theology is explored. This exploration is in the nature of an analytical study of Bonhoeffer’s theology.’

The thesis is a brilliant examination of how Bonhoeffer’s theology will help in the development of an adequate theological approach to Marxism. In elaborating a Bonhoefferian critique to Marxism the author points out areas of similarity as well as those of differences with regard to criticism of religion.

At the very beginning of the thesis, Bishop Paulose makes a significant contribution to the understanding of Marx. Many scholars have suggested that there are two distinct phases in Marx’s writings: early Marx, which includes at least the rather humanistic ideas of the Economic and Philosophical Manuscripts (1844) and The Communist Manifesto (1848); and later Marx which has the much more technical and ‘scientific’ economics of Das Capital, the first volume of which was published in 1867. Bishop Paulose shows that the ‘young’ and the ‘old’ Marx are essentially one and the same and there is a continuity of thought in Marx’s writings. The basic ideas about the human being as Marx expressed them in the Manuscripts and the ideas of the older Marx as expressed in Capital are not contradictory. If there is a theme running through the whole of Marx’s writings, the most obvious would be ‘alienation’, a concept that he developed through confrontation with the ideas of Hegel. Marx’s views on alienation and those on materialism are thus inseparable. Bishop Paulose does not accept the view that only Marx’s early writings are philosophical and that he lost the humanist version in his later writings. "In spite of certain changes in mood and language, the core of the philosophy developed by the young Marx was never changed and it is impossible to understand his concept of socialism and his criticism of capitalism as developed in his later writings except on the basis of the concept of man which he developed in his early writings". The fundamental coherence of Marx’s views is affirmed here. It is that affirmation that provides the theoretical basis of the revolutionary struggle for a democratic humanistic socialism.

Marx was influenced by the philosophy of Hegel and the anthropology of Feuerbach. Hegel may well be the most influential philosopher and political theorist Germany has produced, with the possible exception of Kant. His influence is undeniable across an enormous range of modern social thought, especially in Marxism. Hegel’s views on religion played a vital role in the formation of his thought. Religion together with philosophy was for Hegel the highest form of the spiritual life of human beings. In Germany religion and politics were very much connected in those days. Marx was at one stage a member of a Hegelian discussion group though he soon differed with it. Hegel is well known for his dialectics. The dialectic, according to Hegel, is the process in which any social or intellectual state contains an essential contradiction. To Hegel the contradiction was one of ideas and concepts. To Marx the conflict was of social forces. While Marx made use of Hegel’s dialectical method and continued to urge his followers to study Hegel, he accepted only Hegel’s method and not his philosophy. Marx was not interested in philosophy which was contemplation. He was only interested in philosophy which was capable of intervening in the world.

Bishop Paulose points out how Marx found the views of Feuerbach on religion more helpful. Both Marx and Engels were deeply influenced by Feuerbach’s The Essence of Christianity. This was mainly because Feuerbach abolishes the "theological essence" of religion in favour of its anthropological essence. According to this the essence of religion is the essence of the human being. "Religion is man’s earliest and also indirect form of self-knowledge". Marx obviously liked the origin of religion given in The Essence of Christianity. "Nature listens not to the plaints of man, it is callous to his sorrows. Hence man turns away from Nature, from all visible objects. He turns within, that here, sheltered and hidden from the inexorable powers, he may find audience for his griefs. Here he utters his oppressive secrets; here he gives vent to his stifled sighs. This open air of the heart, this outspoken secret, this uttered sorrow of the soul, is God. God is a tear of love shed in the deepest concealment of human misery. God is an unutterable sigh, lying in the depths of the heart." Bishop Paulose shows how these thoughts of Feuerbach find echo in the comments that Marx made later on religion and God.
"Religious distress is at the same time the expression of real distress and the protest against real distress. Religion is the sigh of the oppressed creature, the heart of a heartless world, just as it is the spirit of a spiritless situation. It is the opium of the people". Bishop Paulose says that it would be a complete distortion if this oft-quoted passage from Marx is taken as some sort of vulgar atheism or as a rejection of religion per se or even as an attack upon religion. The passage has been misused both by Marxists some of whom have made atheism part of their doctrine and by followers of religion who want to show that Marxism is a rejection of rejection of religion. Bishop Paulose points out how both are wrong.

Some of the ideas of Engels have been particularly helpful for Marxist-Christian dialogue and collaboration. These ideas are highlighted by Bishop Paulose. While the ruling classes may wish to employ religious belief and feeling as forces for the retention of their power, religion being a mass phenomenon that transcends classes, may serve as the justification for and inspiration of vast popular movements that are revolutionary. Marxism emphasizes the revolutionary quality of early Christianity and stresses the significant contrast between early and late Christianity. Engels wrote that the history of early Christianity has notable points of resemblance with the modern working class movement.

Marx did not believe that a direct attack against religion would ever work. Any direct struggle against religion appeared to Marx useless and misplaced: useless because religion simply cannot be abolished as long as the world is not put straight: misplaced because the real enemy is the perverted social order of which, as Marx put it, religion is only the spiritual aroma. In the Manuscripts Marx draws an important distinction between atheism and socialism. "Atheism... has no longer any meaning, for atheism is a negation of God, and postulates the existence of man through this negation; but socialism as socialism no longer stands in need of such a mediation." Marxism, manifesting a profound humanism as the heart of its inspiration, naturally opposes religious persecution, Bishop Paulose points out. This is something that has been forgotten both by Marxists and Christians in several situations. The few references to religion that Marx made in his later years indicate that in spite of his lack of interest in this kind of problem, his view on religion and atheism did not change as the years passed. "Everyone should be able to attend to his religious as well as his bodily needs without the police sticking their noses in", Marx argues in his Critique of the Gotha Programme (1875).

But it needs to be pointed out that several followers of Marxism did not follow this wise advice of Marx. Lenin in the 1920’s said, "We must tirelessly carry out atheist propaganda and struggle". The period following the Russian revolution was one of direct confrontation between the church and the state. However not long after, the approach of the government to religious matters became rather cautious. There was much greater emphasis on the need to undermine religion by social and economic action rather than by direct confrontation with religious institutions and believers. Lenin died in 1924, leaving a rather ambiguous legacy concerning religion. An observer commented, "A mainly atheistic outlook tempered by the conviction that the subordination of action against religious bodies to the wider objectives of the state leaves the maximum freedom to pursue whatever policy appears to be the most expedient at any particular juncture".

Bishop Paulose points out that with regard to religion, Mao Zedong is closer to Marx than Lenin. Mao also did not think a struggle against religion was necessary. His critique of religion is essentially sociological and political, as indicated in his statement, "If religion does not interfere with the Peoples Republic, the People’s Republic will not interfere with it". He also said, "We allow various opinions among the people; that is, there is freedom to criticize, to express different views, and to advocate theism or atheism (i.e. materialism)".

The conclusion that Bishop Paulose arrives at after examining in detail Marx’s critique of religion is important. "Whenever Marx attacks religion, or particularly the church, it is an indirect attack on the evils of society. Similarly attacks on the evils of society are indirectly attacks on religion. He challenged the religion of his time to build a just social order. Thus we can say that Marx was, by his sense of injustice found in the society, on the side of the angels. Hence he has been classified with the "Children of Light" and not with the ‘Children of Darkness”.

Bishop Paulose follows up his argument in the next chapter where he deals with "Transcendence According to Marx" and points out that the crucial point and the very essence of Marx’s critique of religion is not its denial of God but the acknowledgment and affirmation of human autonomy. Marx does not accept the Christian conception of the human being, which begins and ends with God, the source of all human actuality and potentiality. Marx’s critique of religion is not primarily and essentially a revolt against God, but rather a struggle on behalf of the human being for fullness and transcendence. This transcendence which opens the human being to unlimited possibilities is a human project. It perpetually opens the way for the future. It is a human choice to remain open to the future. God has no place in it. In religion, transcendence rests on God. God opens the future for the human being who responds. But in Marx’s transcendence God is absent. God puts a restraint on the autonomy and therefore the potential or the human being. Dependence on such a God and the autonomy of the human being are incompatible. For a Christian, transcendence is the act of God who comes to him. For a Marxist, it is a dimension of human activity exploring full potential.

Another distinguished Indian theologian who studied Marx’s views on religion was Fr. Sebastian Kappen. His doctoral thesis submitted to the Gregorian University in Rome, in the year 1961 was "Praxis and Religious Alienation According to the Economic and Philosophical Manuscripts of Karl Marx." The text of the dissertation was published as Marxian Atheism in 1983. Kappen wrote "The essence of Marxian atheism lies not so much in his denunciation of religion as in his affirmation of the radical autonomy and self-sufficiency of man. His criticism of religion is aimed at making man ‘revolve about himself as his own true sun’. (page 14)

Bishop Paulose rightly points out that there is no other aspect of Marxist ideology that has drawn the attention of Christians as much as atheism. He asks Christians to avoid a propagandistic and condemnatory approach in dealing with atheism. Marx’s atheism is essentially humanistic. It starts not from a negation but an affirmation. It affirms the autonomy of the human being and rejects any attempt to deny the human being’s creative power and potential. Therefore Bishop Paulose says, "Marx is trying to restore to people a purpose in life and to give of mankind a higher meaning. We cannot completely ignore this effort, to the extent that it is directed at the progress of humanity. This reminds us that the church must be ready to witness to the Lordship of Christ by cooperating with men of goodwill of all religious and non-religious groups who are genuinely concerned about better ways of living and working". Marx’s critique of religion challenges Christians for a vision of the human being rooted more deeply in reality. It exhorts Christians to act out the implications of the human being made in the image of God who has become incarnate.

We are reminded that Marx’s critique of religion is in many ways similar to those of the prophets of the Old Testament. Like the Biblical prophets Marx fought against the established religion. The prophets criticized religion that was hands in glove with those in power. As Fr. Kappen points out "Believers will have little difficulty in concurring with Marx’s violent attack on the God of ideological legitimation. It is his abiding contribution to have unmasked the class character of God in much of popular worship. The same God is very much alive even today where religious leaders are in league with the powers that be" (Marxian Atheism, page 84). It is therefore our responsibility to prove that to be a Christian does not mean to be the defender of the established order. The church, certainly, can play a vital role for the transformation of society.

Bishop Paulose finds a ‘religious’ element in Marx’s critique of religion. Marx’s concern for the ‘self-consciousness of man’ lies very close to the religious task of being relevant in the world. Seen in this light Marx’s critique of religion may very well be a "religious criticism" of the world. As Fr. Kappen says ‘paradoxically, in spite of his avowed atheism, Marx’s philosophical concern has much in common with the ultimate meaning of human existence. What is the theory of alienation and its suppression but an attempt to unravel the hidden meaning and ultimate goal of history"? (Marxian Atheism, page 84).

It is in connection with Marx’s criticism of religion especially as an ally of the establishment that Bishop Paulose brings in the theology of liberation which he says "represents the final coming-to-terms with Marx, the positive appropriation of Marx’s contribution to modern thought and life".

Bishop Paulose raises some fundamental questions while expressing his hopes about a socialist society. What is the authentic human life? What is the ultimate meaning of human existence? One might say that these questions ought to have been raised with regard to Marxism itself, rather than to the socialist society. It is here that Bonhoeffer’s theology is brought in as a corrective of Marxist critique of religion.

There is a continuing interest in theological circles in the writings of Dietrich Bonhoeffer. This is especially true of Letters and Papers from Prison. Bonhoeffer was executed in the last days of the Second World War in a vengeful act of cruelty by the Nazi regime which he had contested since Hitler came to power in 1933. The Letters as well as the great biography by his close friend Eberhard Berthge, have proved to be of worldwide and lasting significance for many of the leaders and the issues in the ecumenical movement. Much of the subsequent fascination with his legacy has focussed on many layered phrases such as his advocacy of radically new Christian responses to "a world come of age" or his practice of a "secret discipline" of meditation and prayer.

In dealing with Bonhoeffer as a corrective to Marx there is one major difficulty. There are few references to Marx in Bonhoeffer’s writings. This may look strange; there is no reason to believe that he was not familiar with Marxist philosophy. Bishop Paulose suggests two reasons. It would not have been politically wise for Bonhoeffer to refer to Marx in his writings as it would have given Hitler another weapon against him. Again Bonhoeffer was dealing with the greatest challenge of the times viz: Nazism. So rather than trying to find what Bonhoeffer might have written or thought about Marx, the writer examines Bonhoeffer’s critique of religion and then finds the similarities with and differences from Marx’s critique.

At the very outset Bishop Paulose says, "What is important to note is that in spite of the similarities between Marx and Bonhoeffer there is a striking difference which is crucial for our enquiry: Bonhoeffer’s critique of religion grew from, and was directed towards, an extraordinary faith in Christ, Lord of the world. Without this faith such a critique would be impossible. The foundation for the Christian encounter with Marxism is found in Bonhoeffer’s theology in the more basic framework of the confrontation of Christ with the world. His thoughts will, therefore, help us to formulate and synthesize an adequate theological approach to Marxism." Here the thesis becomes a personal testimony. When Bishop Paulose is dealing with Marxism it is out of an extraordinary faith that he speaks. The call for dialogue with Marxists comes out of the basic framework of the confrontation of Christ with the world.

The fundamental question that Bonhoeffer poses before us is "If religion is no more than a ‘garment of Christianity’ which must now be cast aside because it has lost its meaning in a ‘world come of age’, if the real problem facing Christianity today is not so much that of religionlessness, but precisely that of religion, then what does all this mean for the church?" The church must be ready for self-criticism and closely examine the validity of its traditional beliefs and practices in a "work come of age". In one sense the world come of age is a secularised world, where more and more areas of activity which were traditionally under religion are no longer there. Scientific progress and political evolution have brought in this autonomy. Some of the earlier boundaries are gone. This according to Bonhoeffer is the work of Christ. The lordship of Christ corresponds to worldliness, and discipleship to a sharing in this world: the natural, the profane, the rational and the humane are placed not against but with this Christ. This is what Bonhoeffer means by the phrase "world come of age".

Bonhoeffer claims that it is the work of Christ that has made the world secular and "come of age". In his significant work Christianity in World History, a prominent theologian Arend Theodor van Leeuwen has argued that the idea of separating out the things of God from the things of people in such a way as to deny the divine nature of kingship was first formulated in ancient Israel and then became a major motif of Christianity. As Christianity spread across Europe it brought the message of secularization with it. By secularization van Leeuwen did not mean secularism -- the worship of worldly things -- but rather the separation of religious and temporal spheres. Secular culture was according to Leeuwen, Christianity’s gift to the world.

For Bonhoeffer the guiding principle for Christians in this realm is that of identification with the world. We are part of the world Christ came to save and we cannot participate in his saving act unless we do so at those places in the world where we live alongside fellow human beings, whether or not we bear a Christian name. The coming of age leads us to a true recognition of our situation before God. Bishop Paulose says, "It is by this reasoning, namely by a bold effort to answer the question of how Jesus Christ can become lord even of the religionless, that Bonhoeffer arrived at his conclusion that the church should work out and proclaim a ‘non-religious’ interpretation of Biblical and theological concepts".

The two concepts associated with Bonhoeffer are examined in detail in the thesis. They are "non-religious interpretation" and "religionless Christianity". These are interrelated and both are important for an adequate understanding of the development of the thinking of Bonhoeffer. Bonhoeffer maintains that the Biblical understanding of God directs us to a powerless and suffering God who is with us and who calls us to share his suffering for the sake of the world. But it is not this God that religion presents. He observes that Christian religion has become a separate part among the other parts of life, a mere section of the whole. This is because of the partial nature of religion in contrast to ‘faith’. "The ‘religious act’ is always something partial, ‘faith’ is something whole, involving the whole of one’s life." Bonhoeffer criticises the privileged character of the church.
Bonhoeffer’s critique of religion in its most comprehensive form found in his prison writings. But it had evolved over a number of years. Bishop Paulose points out that the critique of religion confronted Bonhoeffer immediately with a problem: finding a non-religious language to interpret the Biblical and theological concepts. "It will be a new language, perhaps quite non-religious, but liberating and redeeming— as was Jesus’ language; it will be the language of a new righteousness and truth, proclaiming God’s peace with men and the coming of his kingdom". Bishop Paulose became a "secular theologian" as he described himself, by using such liberating and redeeming language, listened to and understood perhaps by more outside the church than inside. The influence of Bonhoeffer on Bishop Paulose was profound and direct. He affirms, "We should remember that Bonhoeffer’s non-religious interpretation does not arise out of any doubts about Christ but is first and last a Christological interpretation. He always tries to pursue Christological questions by means of non-religious interpretation." The non-religious interpretation of Biblical concepts means that the concepts must be interpreted in such a way as not to make religion a precondition of faith.

Bishop Paulose followed in his preaching what he learned from Bonhoeffer. "One thing is quite clear from what Bonhoeffer says: the criterion for the understanding of our preaching should not be how well it is understood by the believer, but by the non-believer". The usual Christian preaching does not communicate to those outside the church; it is not understood by them. Bishop Paulose was one of the few church leaders who spoke in a language that was understood by all. He could speak to people outside the church also about his faith in a secular language.

Like Bonhoeffer he believed that "The church is the church only when it exists for others". With his interpretation Bonhoeffer does not reject the church, only affirms it in a new way; the way of life in the church which Bonhoeffer envisions is one of what he calls "religionless Christianity". This of course is a concept which has led to endless controversy. Bishop Paulose points out that surprisingly, Bonhoeffer himself used the expression "religionless Christianity" only in the famous letter of April 30, 1944. Bishop Paulose elaborates three themes which were very close to Bonhoeffer and revealed in his prison letters. These themes are "holy worldliness", "theology of responsibility" and "secret discipline". With regard to "holy worldliness", Bishop Paulose quotes from the diary of Dag Hammarskjold, the second Secretary-General of the United Nations, Markings, "In our era, the road to holiness necessarily passes through the world of action". Bonhoeffer defines responsibility as "the total and realistic response of man to the claim of God and of our neighbour". The "secret discipline" is not something to escape from the reality of the world but one of struggle as Andre Dumas points out. "The secret discipline is... A reminder that man following after Christ is subject to the whole of reality, and cannot be content with only a portion of the world around him that has become tolerable and manipulable under his direction. To have come of age, to be religionless, implies this secret discipline of struggle, which for the Christian is the very secret that God shares with man".

Marx maintained that the future to which the human being is moving is completely open. It is this possibility that enables the human being to move towards the future along an original road that entails freedom and choice. This according to Marx is transcendence. God does not play any role in this. Bonhoeffer’s concept of transcendence is similar to that of Marx up to a point only. He rejected the doctrine of God popularly associated with much of the history of theology. He replaced it with an understanding of transcendence which is focussed upon the humanity of Christ and the participation of the disciple through him in the life of the world come of age.

Bishop Paulose underlines the critical difference between the two. Bonhoeffer’s thesis responds to Marx that faith in the transcendent God is not a fleeing away from the affairs of the world. On the contrary, it is taking full responsibility of the reality of the world. Bishop Paulose sums up the discussion, "Marx and Bonhoeffer emphasised the autonomy of man. But in the search for the autonomy of man Bonhoeffer was not so much removing God from the world’s affairs as searching for God’s real presence in the world. Whereas Marx found God as standing in the way of man’s freedom and autonomy, a barrier to human emancipation, Bonhoeffer believed that God granted freedom and autonomy for man by making Jesus the point of disclosure for His transcendence. Whereas Marx defined transcendence as man’s possibility to move towards the future with freedom and choice, so that he could shape his own destiny, Bonhoeffer gave a this-worldly interpretation of transcendence in which the experience of transcendence is Jesus being there for others."

The thesis proceeds to show how in addition to being a challenge to the church, Bonhoefferian theology functions also as a challenge to Marxist philosophy. Bonhoeffer emphasized that in the modern secular age the mission of the church must assume a secular style. His consistent effort for a non-religious interpretation of Christianity was to reform the church in such a way that it could truly be a prophet and servant to the contemporary person. As already pointed out, his plea for a non-religious Christianity is also a plea for a redefinition of the church. He reminds us that if the church is to fulfil its mission it needs to be redefined and refashioned from within.
Encounter in Humanization: Insights for Christian-Marxist Dialogue and Cooperation

As Marx’s criticism is a challenge to the Christians to rethink their own beliefs, Bonhoeffer’s criticism also is a challenge to the church. Bishop Paulose draws a parallel between "opium of the people" and "cheap grace". For Marx, "Religion is the sigh of the oppressed creature, the heart of a heartless world, just as it is the spirit of a spiritless situation. It is the opium of the people". According to Bonhoeffer, "We Lutherans have gathered like eagles around the carcass of cheap grace, and there we have drunk of the poison which has killed the life of following Christ".

In spite of this apparent similarity there are fundamental differences as already shown. Bonhoeffer’s theology functions as a corrective of Marx’s criticism of religion. The challenge to the Marxists is to re-examine their philosophy to see whether they take into consideration the human person in wholeness. Bishop Paulose makes this his own challenge to Marxists. Quoting Marx’s famous words "The philosophers have only interpreted the world, in various ways: the point, however, is to change it", Bishop Paulose says, "In order to change the world, philosophy must embrace the totality of human existence, its material as well as spiritual dimension. Marx fails to do this".

Fr. Kappen also grapples with this question of the larger issue of human existence in dealing with Marxian atheism. "In his preoccupation with the analysis of the capitalist system, he (Marx) failed to do justice to the sphere of the personal and the subjective, the sphere where the human drama of hope and despair, love and hate, death and survival is enacted... Had Marx paid sufficient attention to these existential problems, he might have been led to a more critical assessment of his atheist stance."

The authentic Christian faith that Bonhoeffer upholds is something other than the ‘religion’ that Marx criticised. Therefore Bishop Paulose points out that Marx’s theory that all religions are enemies of social revolution does not hold true. The "religionless Christian" who leads a "worldly life", as portrayed by Bonhoeffer, certainly plays a vital role in the transformation of society. Bishop Paulose concludes this discussion, "In this way we respond to Marx’s critique of religion that Christianity is not the opium of the people but a way of life in which the Christian participates in Jesus’ ‘being there for others’, for the total humanization of humanity."

The final chapter of the thesis is "A Call for Dialogue". The Bishop sums up the basis of this call succinctly. "By examining Marx’s critique of religion optimistically and without prejudice we found that Marxists and Christians can agree, in spite of several disagreements, that both are ultimately concerned for true humanity, especially for the rights of the poor and the needy, the hungry and hopeless; both could agree that they strive to be ‘true to the earth’. We observed that Marx’s atheism is primarily an anthropological affirmation; it is another way of putting human being in the centre of human interest and concern. We also found that Marx’s critique of religion indeed helps us to awaken from our dogmatic slumber. By making a Bonhoefferian corrective of Marx’s critique of religion, we demonstrated that whatever the traditional interpretation or historical function of Christian faith may have been, its essential ingredients allow for a radical reaffirmation of man’s this-worldly being. The essence of Christian faith is even consistent with unqualified commitment to revolutionary struggle in the name of man against the forces of alienation. This corrective also served the purpose of presenting to the church a new understanding of itself and of autonomous modern world, and it reminded us what it means to be a Christian in the world come of age."

Bishop Paulose offers a number of guidelines for dialogue. The dialogue that Bishop Paulose calls for is not to be confined to philosophical or doctrinal issues although dialogue on these issues will always be necessary. Primarily it should be on the common task of dealing with the urgent issues that confront us, like hunger and poverty, illiteracy and pollution.

There is only one reference to liberation theology in the thesis. This may be because liberation theology was just at its beginning stage when the thesis was written. Bishop Paulose expresses the opinion that liberation theology was the final coming to terms of theology with Marx, the positive appropriation of Marx’s contribution to modern thought and life. While Bishop Paulose was popularly known as a liberation theologian he preferred the title "secular theologian". He was conscious that he was always speaking to an audience larger than the church, a secular audience.

While the thesis mentions directly only about the influence of Marx on liberation theology, students of liberation theology have always acknowledged the influence of Bonhoeffer. Bonhoeffer issued a call to redefine religion in a secular context. His theology emphasizes human responsibility towards others, and stresses the value of seeing the world with "the view from below -- the perspective of the poor and the oppressed. This was a framework many liberation theologians found significant and useful.

Liberation theology burst on the scene with startling creativity in the early seventies in Latin America. "While the rich variety of liberationist writings defies easy characterization, most of the writers are united in one overpowering theme; the Gospel of Jesus Christ is represented most authentically in the liberation of the world’s oppressed people from their bondage. The gospel is not an otherworldly escape from the hard realities of this world. Rather it addresses these realities directly, empowering the oppressed to seize control of their own destiny and to establish a new order of freedom and peace." (J. P. Wogaman in Christian Perspective on Politics).

Liberation theology started in Latin America gut quickly extended its influence to many parts of the world. The theologies of liberation had a strong anti-systemic stance which brought them often into conflict with powers they addressed, both political and ecclesiastical. Their approach to poverty and oppression came out of their understanding of the gospel. To be sure their analysis explored the roots of the problem and found more than economic causes. Liberation theologians have been at their strongest when they have been related to concrete communities and problems.

Here in studying the thesis of Bishop Paulose we will confine our discussion to the question of relationship between liberation theology and Marxism. It is sometimes suggested that liberation theology is little more than Marxism with a Christian face. Many of the liberation theologians particularly the Latin Americans, do substantially and consciously rely upon Marxist forms of analysis. Bishop Paulose says, in an essay in honour of Fr. Kappen, Liberation theology and Marxism, "There are a number of liberation theologians who employ Marxian methodology and terminology in their writings. However they do not exhort the people to read the works of Karl Marx in the light of the Bible but to study the Bible in the light of Marx’s works. In other words they seek the aid of Marx for a deeper insight into and clearer understanding of the Bible”.

Liberation theologians want to make sure that Christian faith will not be used as ideological support for selfish interests and repressive situations. In an interesting chapter on the Marxian theme of religion as the "opiate of the people", Jose Miguez Bonino welcomes the criticism "as a valid warning against the self-deception and confusion which so easily creep into a political programme of any sort when it is clothed in religious language". He adds "we can see how religious faith can be used for reactionary purposes. It does not need to be a conscious use, it even functions better when it is practised unwittingly" (Christians and Marxists).

Liberation theologians believe that real truth is revealed through praxis -- a term that is itself derived from Marxist literature. Knowledge about things that matter is not derived through exposure to abstract ‘truths’, rather it is in reflecting upon our actions to affect things that matter. "A theology of liberation", writes Gustavo Gutierrez, "offers us not so much a new theme for reflections as a new way to do theology". Such a theology "does not stop with reflection on the world, but rather tries to be part of the process through which the world is transformed". A Theology of Liberation… (sic) Such words are reminiscent of Marx’s own dictum that "the philosophers have only interpreted the world, in various ways: the point however is to change it." Bishop Paulose says "The proposition of liberation theologians is exactly the same. They are bent on ‘doing’ theology rather than contemplating it. Theology which is based on the gospel can be timely, only as it assumes new and bold forms in relation to the actual historical situation and the particular needs of the people in their own time" (Liberation Theology and Marxism). The theologian must be immersed in the struggle for transforming society and proclaim the message of the gospel from that point. Theologians are not to be mere theoreticians, but practitioners who participate in the ongoing struggle to liberate the oppressed.

Liberation theology to a large extent agrees with Marxist analysis in its identification with the oppressed in the struggle against the oppressor. Christians have a "preferential option for the poor"; conveying the point that Christians choose side with the poor. Many liberation theologians have largely accepted a Marxian interpretation of class conflict and the causes of poverty.

Bishop Paulose claimed that liberation theology is more prophetic than Marxist. It gives poignant expression to the swell of protest against oppressive socio-economic formations and to the powerful yearning for a system founded on justice.

The question is raised how relevant liberation theology is, if it owes so much to Marxism, in the wake of the collapse of the socialist system in Eastern Europe and the widespread disillusionment it has created. There is no denying that there is a crisis with regard to liberation theology and many of its earlier supporters do not find it relevant. The response to this has to be, whether the situation in the world and the lot of the oppressed today do not demand even a greater commitment of a theology of liberation? If liberation theology arose out of a consciousness of the oppression of the people by the capitalist system, then there is surely greater need of a theology of liberation in this age of globalization.

Speaking to the European Parliament in November 1989 at a time when socialist regimes were falling all over Central and Eastern Europe, the Archbishop of Canterbury Robert Runcie said, "The apparent defeat of communism in Europe should not be seen as a triumph of capitalism. The nearer capitalism comes to triumphing totally more questions are raised about its capacity to be magnanimous in victory, to heed the cries of the poor at home and aboard to seek the path of peace and to care tenderly for the earth". Three years later in an interview to an Italian journal, Pope John Paul II said, "The proponents of extreme capitalism in any form tend to overlook the good things achieved by communism, the struggle against unemployment and the concern for the poor".

About the new situation that raises questions about the relevance of liberation theology, Pablo Richard says, "The conditions in the Third World that gave birth to liberation theology have not changed. As long as the scandal of poverty and oppression exists and as long as there are Christians who live and critically reflect on their faith in the context of the struggle for justice and life, liberation theology will continue to exist". The relevance of many elements of Marxism, as a basis for reflection to identify the root causes of oppression as well as to explore the means to overcome this oppression, is re-affirmed by liberation theologians. They remind us that liberation theology has never been a new theology but rather a new way of doing theology -- from the perspective of the poor and their struggle for justice and liberation. They had always rejected the idea that theology is a systematic collection of timeless and culture-transcending truths that remains static for all generations. Rather theology is in flux; it is a dynamic and ongoing exercise involving contemporary insights into knowledge, humanity and history. Therefore there is a new demand on liberation theology to take into account the new dimensions of oppression and subjugation brought in by economic globalization.

Here the tools of analysis developed under Marxist influence are still found useful. Even non-Marxist social scientists have found the description of globalization in the Communist Manifesto not only prophetic but of validity in analyzing the new stage of capitalism. As ‘description’ of systems of oppression Marxism has much to teach. As a ‘prescription’ for a new society it will need re-appraisal especially in the light of recent experiences and new developments. In general liberation theologians have given more emphasis to description of the situation than to prescribing economic alternatives. Their concern was for the dehumanizing consequences of capitalism as seen through the prism of the gospel and Jesus’ own way of life. This concern should heighten in the context of the new stage of capitalism, encourage search for alternatives and affirm signs of hope in the new struggles and resistance of the marginalised.

Bishop Paulose’s thesis is a plea for Christian- Marxist dialogue. By the time the thesis was submitted Christian-Marxist dialogue had received a set-back. Ans vander Bent traces the History. "Dialogue between Christians and Marxists, which began in the 1950’s and flourished in the 1960’s, was the result of a relaxation in the East-West tensions of cold war. The de-Stalinization campaign, the changes in the Roman Catholic Church following the Second Vatican Council, and the growth of the ecumenical movement all contributed to bringing Marxists and Christians together for serious conversations about critical issues. Prominent participants from Marxist side included R. Garaudy, V. Gardavsky, M. Machovec and E. Bloch; and such Christian theologians as H. Hromadka, A. Dumas, G. Girardi, K. Rahner and J. M. Gonzalez - Ruiz were involved at one time or another. The Paulus- Geselleschaft, under the leadership of Erich Kellner, sponsored a number of international symposia during the 1960s in the Federal Republic of Germany and Austria, bringing together Marxist and Christian thinkers.’ (Ecumenical Dictionary)
After the Warsaw Pact forces moved into Czechoslovakia in 1968 to suppress the movement led by Alexander Dubcek, Marxist-Christian dialogue declined swiftly. Although it did not disappear entirely, encounters during the 1970’s were less publicized and more widely diffused than earlier ones. Bishop Paulose wrote the thesis around the time and notes that Christian-Marxist dialogue "has in recent years been smothered by unfavourable international politics."

A welcome addition to the subject of Marxist-Christian dialogue is a book by the Anglican theologian James Bentley, Between Marx and Christ, The Dialogue in German-Speaking Europe. 1870-1970. This book was reviewed by Rudolf C. Heredia in the Economic and Political Weekly of September 12, 1992. In the second half of the nineteenth century Germany contained the largest urban proletariat in the world. Clergymen and politicians had to grapple with this to retain any kind of credibility. Christian theologians set out on a critical examination of the life of Jesus and the social and political implications of his teachings. Marxist ideologues too began "to describe the founder of Christianity as a quasi-mythical primitive communist". Reviewing the book Heredia says, "In going back to their origins both sides discovered the potential for a constructive dialogue, even though dialectical contradictions still remained. However it was in their resistance to Hitler that their mutual suspicions were finally dissolved and the need to cooperate in building a socialist humanism was strongly felt. After the war, radical Christians criticized the Church’s cooperation by the ruling classes even as open-minded party members came to realize how repressive some Marxist regimes could be. But just as the dialogue was gaining momentum the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia set it back drastically".

Heredia sums up the lessons of Christian-Marxist dialogue till now, with the end of cold war establishing a new and unprecedented context for dialogue. "We discover that the real openness to dialogue is created not in the intellectual world of concepts, but in the existential encounter of action. For it is in working together to liberate the oppressed masses through critical social intervention, and to oppose tyrannical oppression like Nazism, that mutual trust and appreciation is engendered, and a common ground founded on our basic humanness opened."

From the time he returned to Kerala, India, after his studies in the USA, Bishop Paulose was in constant dialogue with Marxists, in the fields of thought and action. His main interlocutor was E. M. S. Namboodiripad, popularly known as EMS, the most distinguished of Indian communists, a Marxist intellectual of high calibre who was also a brilliant strategist. Bishop Paulose openly acknowledged his indebtedness to EMS in the evolution of his political ideas. He apparently influenced EMS to some extent in his attitude to followers of religion. There were other Christian leaders in Kerala too engaged in dialogue with EMS. They included Metropolitan Paulose Mar Gregorios and M.M.Thomas. Unfortunately all these four persons passed away within a short period between 1996 and 1998.

After reading the thesis of Bishop Paulose, EMS wrote an article in which he suggested its publication. This book is a response to that suggestion as well as to similar suggestions made by many. EMS pointed out that the commitment to dialogue that is reflected in Bonhoeffer's "religionless Christianity has two aspects. One, the centre of Christianity is not the salvation that will be available in the other world, but the human good in this world. Second, belief in God and devotion to Jesus Christ are needed for the good in this world even if not for salvation in the other. EMS said: "On one hand there is similarity and on the other there is difference between Marxism and this theology about Christian belief. Action for the good of the human being is at the centre of both". EMS was conscious of the limitations as well as the possibilities of Christian-Marxist dialogue. He maintained that what is feasible is cooperation on the practical plane with recognition on both sides of the differences at the theoretical level while having dialogue also at the theoretical level. But not only dialogue but also common action should be organized between Marxism and theologies including Christian theology. (EMS Diary, Volume I)

In the introduction to his book Freedom is God Bishop Paulose had acknowledged the influence of Marxist humanism in addition to Bonhoeffor’s "religionless Christianity" at the time of writing his thesis. EMS criticised this statement of the Bishop on Marxist humanism as half-truth in the article mentioned above. EMS maintained that Marxist humanism is unique. Marx’s socio-economic vision is not just humanism, but humanism arising out of the vision of class struggle. Perhaps EMS was not familiar with the ideas of a number of prominent theologians who accept class struggle as a fact and as a tool for analysis. They acknowledge the role of class conflict in social transformation. Many liberation theologians have quoted the opening sentence in the Communist Manifesto "The history of all hitherto existing society is the history of class struggle". George Cassalis says: "Marx and Engels, in the wake of other philosophers, used the notion of class struggles to formulate a value judgement on social reality. At the same time, it can be said that they have also made us aware of a fundamental fact about the evolution of society and, even more than that, they have indicated a basic law for operating in its evolution". (Correct Ideas Don’t Fall from the Skies)

In the George M. Philip lecture of 1995, EMS said that the idea of finding solutions to practical problems by cooperation between religious believers and Marxists is more relevant in Kerala than in any other state of India. He pointed out the baneful effects of politics in Kerala as a result of the conflicts between religious believers and Marxists from the time of the formation of the state. If cooperation is to be possible there should be a radical reappraisal on both sides about their perceptions of each other. In another article (in Marxist Samvadam, "Marxist Dialogue") EMS said that a problem that needs solution in dealing with Kerala politics is the approach of Marxist-Leninists to religious communities and their followers. The responsibility of Marxist-Leninists is not only to propagate materialist ideas but to lead the social, economic and political struggle. Marxist-Leninists have a duty to work along with leaders and followers of religious communities. Overcoming the contradictions in the realm of ideas, it is possible for followers of different religions and Marxist-Leninists to join together in practical politics. He said that for this some things have to be done on both sides. Though not believers themselves, Marxist-Leninists should be prepared to respect religious leaders; on the other hand religious leaders and their followers should understand the position of the Marxist-Leninists and be prepared to respect it. He points out that there is a tendency on the part of Marxist-Leninists to hold on to the one sentence of Marx, "religion is the opium of the people" and always to oppose the religion which is described as opiate. This should change and Marxist-Leninists should try to understand the context of this sentence and also learn about the form and growth of religion on the basis of Marxism-Leninism.

Bishop Paulose was seen always in the border regions of faith. There he saw the struggles of the exploited workers, toiling masses and the oppressed tribals. He developed a language of secular theology there. It was his solidarity with the people in their struggle, his ‘doing theology’, that equipped him for the dialogue with Marxists. Secular Kerala heard a special voice from Bishop Paulose, a voice that is rarely heard from Church leaders. Once when I showed him an extract from a well-known pastoral letter of a French Bishop, he felt it reflected his own views. The pastoral letter by Bishop Huyghes of Arras was written in March 1972 on the occasion of a visit by the French Prime Minister, M. J. Chaban-Delmas, following demonstrations by workers: "Christians, both workers and officials, joined their comrades in the legitimate defense of their employment, which is increasingly under fire in the region. These Christians were the Church, and they did not wait for me to make it present. Silence is imposed on the poor of the world, on the poor of Pas-de-Calais, in the name of economic necessity or of political prudence. But if the poor are silenced, Christians are entitled to provide them with a voice.

Bishop Paulose’s call for a dialogue with Marxists is a call to join together in giving a voice to the poor, affirming solidarity with them, and to be part of the larger struggles for justice and liberation. This call he made as a participant in the struggle for justice for the poor and as one who consistently defended secular democracy in India. It is thus easy to identify the main areas in which there should be dialogue and cooperation between Christians and Marxists in India today. They are economic justice in the context of globalization and secular democracy in the context of the onslaught of communalism and fascism.

Christian response to what happens in the secular order should not be for Christians alone, nor should it be in a country like India by Christians acting alone. The East Asia Christian Assembly (Kuala Lumpur 1959) affirmed two things: Christians have certain Christian insights about the contemporary historical situation which may be held in faith; Christian insights can be translated into secular insights. Today Christians in India are called upon to translate their Christian insights into secular insights and join forces with all those who work for justice and human dignity. On issues like economic justice and secularism this opens up avenues for cooperation between Christians and Marxists.

In a famous pastoral letter in 1986 the Catholic Bishops Conference of the United States identified political economy as one of the chief areas where Christians live out their faith. There is a clear demand on the part of the Christians in India to work for economic justice especially in view of the swifter and greater marginalization of the poor as a result of economic reforms under globalization. The French thinker Ignacio Ramonet in an article in the Fall 1999 issue of Foreign Policy magazine wrote, "globalization is set up to be a kind of modern divine critic requiring submission, faith, worship and new rites". Christians have a special responsibility to challenge and expose the false theology of the free market. For doing that they will find Marxist analysis useful.
A study by the National Council for Applied Economic Research recently found that poverty has increased in India since the liberalization process began in 1991. The same conclusion has been reached by studies of the World Bank and Food and Agriculture Organization. The Tenth Human Development Report of 1999 observed: "...market dominated globalization has led to the growing marginalisation of poor nations and people, growing human insecurity and growing inequality with benefits accruing almost solely to the richest people and countries... the global gap between the haves and the have-nots is widening". Christians and Marxists can have fruitful collaboration in the struggles for economic justice.

As already mentioned Bishop Paulose was a champion of secular democracy. In defending and promoting the principles of secularism in India, which is inseparable from democracy, he actively collaborated with Marxists. He brought Christian insights into the discussion and underlined the task of the church in promoting secular democracy.

One major issue that Christians in India have to deal with today is the threat to the secular state. The threat is manifested in the attacks on minorities and assaults on religious freedom but they are only part of a project to alter the secular character of India.

The attempt to alter the character of the state is sought to be carried out through redefinition. Secularism is redefined as tolerance of the majority community. Once secularism is redefined as tolerance, then the secular state comes to mean the truly tolerant one. From there it is an easy step to advocating a Hindu nation and implicitly a Hindu state or one which is in some sense affiliated to the majority religion. After all Hinduism is claimed to be the most tolerant of all religious systems and therefore most conducive to true secularism. Those who support this argument provide powerful legitimacy to the overall project of Hindutva. In India only the leftist movement has openly opposed this equation of secularism with tolerance forthrightly and it is clear with whom Christians can cooperate in the matter.

There is also the redefinition of nationalism linking it to the majority religion. This goes against the fundamental principle of nationalism as upheld during the freedom struggle as the aspiration for freedom of all people living in this country irrespective of religion or caste. The principle that the nation belongs to all its citizens has been repeatedly questioned by the Hindutva forces. In trying to impose the ideology of the Hindu nation these forces are using fascist methods. Christians should collaborate with secular movements, especially the Marxists, in affirming and protecting the frame and content of the secular state in India.

The prophetic criticism by Bishop Paulose will continue to inspire a large number of those inside and outside the Church. He drew lessons for such criticism from Bonhoeffer and Marx. Such criticism was effective because he was a participant in the struggles. M.M.Thomas, who also influenced Bishop Paulose deeply, has written, "There are many Christians and Churches who like to engage themselves in prophetic criticism. There is certainly a place for it. But only participants earn the right to be prophets. The call by God to speak the word of judgement comes only to those who have affirmed their solidarity with the people under God and stood where they stand".

In the thesis and in his life, Bishop Paulose showed that the task of theology is not just to interpret the situation. He was ‘doing theology’ and thus attempting to change the world. This is the task of every Christian, to discern the times and work for the change. The followers of Marx also are engaged in a similar task. Together they should analyze and attempt to change the world. This message of encounter in humanization is conveyed powerfully through this significant theological contribution of Bishop Paulose Mar Paulose.
Chapter 1: Marx and Bonhoeffer on Religion

This study is presented as a contribution to Christian-Marxist dialogue. Marx proclaims the autonomy and affirms the self-transcendence of the human being. Both these are deepened and challenged by Bonhoeffer’s theological understanding of Incarnation. What is being investigated here is the extent to which Bonhoeffer’s theology will help in the development of an adequate theological approach to Marxism. This study seeks to elaborate a Bonhoefferian corrective of Marx’s critique of religion.

There are certain areas of similarity in the writings of Bonhoeffer and Marx. For example, Bonhoeffer’s criticism of metaphysics echoes Marx’s denunciation of religion as "a reversed world consciousness." The "opium of the people" in Marx is not unrelated to the "cheap grace" in Bonhoeffer. To a certain extent, both Marx and Bonhoeffer consider religion a particular stage in human historical development. Marx believed that when class oppression ended the "false consciousness" that arose from the alienation of the human being and reflected in religious systems, would disappear. Bonhoeffer thought that religion was nothing but a "garment of Christianity" which it wore during a particular epoch of human history, and that we are now moving to a time of "religionless..."
Nevertheless, these apparent similarities should not be overemphasized. Though both Marx and Bonhoeffer criticized religion the differences in their respective critiques are remarkable. Marx’s critique of religion stems from the notion that the idea of a creator God hinders the limitless future and impoverishes the perspectives, endeavours and struggles of human beings. Human creativity cannot reach its potential in such a God, i.e., outside the human. Accordingly, Marx’s concept of transcendence consists essentially of endeavours and activities aimed at going beyond the given reality, the world as it is; overcoming it practically and transforming it to the benefit of humanity. Transcendence opens the way for the future. However, Marx does not regard this opening of a new future as an incursion of the divine into human history. He conceives transcendence to be a dynamic human reality, a self-transcending formation of the meaning and values of human life. Thus the objective of Marx’s critique of religion is the affirmation of human creativity and autonomy.

Whereas Marx completely abandoned the concept of God by his critique of religion, Bonhoeffer tried to reinterpret the concept of God so that it would be understandable to the autonomous modern person living in a "world come of age". According to him, it was the Incarnation which made possible the coming of age. He recognized that the world’s coming of age consisted of a knowledge of God which seeks to follow God where He has preceded us. This requires that we act responsibly in the situations where God has placed us. It was this recognition of the world’s coming of age that led Bonhoeffer to a critique of religion. He did not want to abolish religion, but maintained that if the Church is to be relevant to our time it must be ready to criticize itself and re-examine its traditional beliefs find practices. The paradoxical expression "religionless Christianity is not to be understood as a movement against the organized Church, rather it is a new way of life in which the Christian will practise the "secret discipline," for "Jesus calls men, not to a new religion, but to life".

There is a notable lack of reference to Marx in Bonhoeffer’s writings. However, we may employ Bonhoeffer as a catalyst for a meaningful encounter with Marxism. Whereas Marx considered that God stood in the way of human freedom and autonomy, Bonhoeffer demonstrated that it is precisely God who grants freedom and autonomy to human beings. He does it by making Jesus the point of disclosure of God’s transcendence. He believed that a world isolated by its illusion of autonomy, which does not take seriously the revelation of God in Jesus Christ, is only a utopia of ambitious people. Bonhoeffer directs our attention to the figure of Jesus of Nazareth, who humbled himself and made himself of no account, as a norm and standard for revolution and humanization. The task of revolution and humanization is accomplished not by overthrowing the world but by its reconciliation with God. The reality of the world can be confronted and overcome by the perfect love of God, as it is revealed in Jesus Christ. The transformation of the world is thus achieved by participating in this Jesus "being there for others". These are the outlines of a Bonhoefferian corrective of Marx. And yet, this is not just a corrective to Marx, but a clarion call to the church to awaken from its dogmatic slumber and come to a new understanding of Christian witness in our time.
Encounter in Humanization: Insights for Christian-Marxist Dialogue and Cooperation

The corrective is developed examining the writings of Karl Marx and Dietrich Bonhoeffer. Since it is impossible to divorce Friedrich Engles from any consideration of Marxist philosophy, his writings also are taken into account. Although all the works of Marx are utilized, special emphasis is given to his early writings. This does not mean that we subscribe to the theory held by some that Marx’s early writings are basically different from his later writings and that there is a discontinuity in his thought. In fact the continuity of Marx’s thought is the topic of the opening chapter in this study. Marx’s thinking was very much influenced by his predecessors, and without reference to Hegel and Feuerbach his thoughts cannot be properly understood or interpreted. We do this as briefly as possible. In analyzing Marx’s critique of religion, caution has been taken not to confuse our understanding of Marx through a premature Christian apologetic. This approach is necessary to understand Marx’s criticisms in the right perspective. The chapter on "Transcendence According to Marx" deals with the deeper dimensions of Marx’s critique of religion as these might be applied in the fulfillment of Marxist programme. We then make a theological evaluation of Marx’s critique of the religion and find out how much the church can appropriate from this critique.

Our next step is to examine Bonhoeffer’s critique of religion. All the writings of Bonhoeffer are used, with special emphasis on his prison writings. Dissatisfaction has been expressed in various circles of the theological world about the fragmentary nature of the prison writings. Here the writer agrees with John Phillips when he says,
Perhaps what [Bonhoeffer] was communicating to us in spite of all of his immersion in the German way of doing theology was a desire to do theology off the top of his head and out of his guts rather than by deciphering scrolls. (John Phillips, "The Killing of Brother Dietrich", Christianity and Crisis, Vol. XXIX, No. 2, 1969, p. 26.)

It was Bonhoeffer’s realization of the world’s coming of age that made necessary for him a critique of religion and that led him to a new understanding of the church. He found the guidelines for this new understanding of the church in what he calls "non-religious interpretation". But by this new kind of interpretation he did not reject the idea of the church; but the way of life in the church which he envisioned, he called "religionless Christianity". Accordingly, we develop these three interrelated themes -- world come of age, nonreligious interpretation, and religionless Christianity. The chapter on "Transcendence According to Bonhoeffer" develops Bonhoeffer’s Christocentric view of human life. It is from this Christocentric view of human life that we offer our corrective of Marx’s critique of religion and present a challenge to contemporary Marxists.

Both Marxism and Christianity have come a long way from the time of Marx in their attitude toward each other. In the light of this unfolding development we discuss, in the concluding chapter, the necessity and promise of Marxist-Christian dialogue, and suggest how the mutual challenge could serve the interests of both in pro-existence.
Chapter 2: The Continuity of Marx’s Thought

The question of continuity and discontinuity of Marx’s thought has been a major issue of debate in the study of Marxism. This question is particularly important not only because numerous conflicting answers have been given to it, but also because the different theoretical answers have been connected with divergent practical aims and actions. Unless we resolve this problem the study of any aspect of Marxism, particularly that of Marx’s critique of religion, will not be fruitful.

There are those who maintain that fundamental differences exist between the ‘young’ or ‘immature’ Marx, represented by his writings up to 1844, and the ‘old’ or ‘mature Marx, represented by his later works. They hold the view that alienation, a concept that was central to Marx’s early thought, was abandoned later by Marx. Sidney Hook, for example, writes: "It is easy to show that the notion of human alienation -- except for the sociological meaning it has in Capital is actually foreign to Marx’s conception of Man."¹

Another writer has stated that whereas:
In the young Marx there was a double vision of the nature of alienation, ... Marxist thought developed along one narrow road of economic conceptions of property and exploitation, while the other road, which might have led to new, humanistic concepts of work and labor, was left unexplored.\(^2\)

In a major study of Hegel and Post-Hegelian movements, Herbert Marence gives an extensive summary of early Marxism and concludes: ‘Under all aspects, however, Marx’s early writings are mere preliminary stages to his mature theory, stages that should not be overemphasized.”\(^3\)

Those who distinguish between the ‘young’ and ‘old’ Marx claim that the ideas of the young Marx contained in The Economic & Philosophic Manuscripts of 1844\(^4\) were abandoned by the older and mature Marx as remnants of an idealistic past connected with Hegel’s teaching.

Since Marx has not worked out his thoughts on alienation systematically in later writings, the impression is given that they do not have much to do with the self. Their manifest content is not the self but society. This is epitomized in Marx’s statement: "Capital is... not a personal, it is a social power".\(^5\) As presented in the Manifesto of the Communist Party, the Marxian theory of history runs exclusively in abstract social and economic categories. The realities with which it purports to deal are socio-economic realities, such as the economic base of society and the ideological superstructures, the antagonistic classes into which society is said to be split, the property system by means of which the capitalist class exploits the proletarian class, and so forth. Here everything is impersonal, strictly societal. The very idea of the human being has seemingly gone out of sight along with the idea of self-alienation. Thus those who postulate the split between the young’ and old’ Marx seem to be confronted with two distinct Marxisms -- the most striking difference being that of the disappearance of the "self-alienated man" in the later writings of Marx.

On the other hand, there is a significant group of philosophical scholars, existentialists, religious thinkers and Marxist dissenters who take the opposite position. For them the original ‘humanistic’ Marxism is the most valuable and significant contribution of Marx, and the depersonalized mature system appears to be a distortion of humanistic concerns. Those whose primary field of interest is religion find serious religious significance in the earlier writings of Marx. Existentialists who regard modern man’s alienation as their central problem consider the early Marx as one in their fold. Within the Communist movement itself, particularly in various European sections of it, the early writings of Marx have been of great influence. A number of so-called ‘revisionists’, disillusioned by the Stalinist outcome of Russian Communism, have turned to Marx’s Manuscripts in search of a morally meaningful Marxism.

We hold the view that the ‘young’ and the ‘old’ Marx are essentially one and the same, and that there is a continuity of thought in Marx’s writings. The basic ideas on the human being, as Marx expressed them in the Manuscripts, and the ideas of the older Marx as expressed in Capital, are not contradictory. Marx did not renounce his earlier views completely. Evidently Marxist ideas of both earlier and later periods are significant for us. Therefore, our approach to the problem should be that of considering it in a purely factual way by inquiring into the relation between them.

Marx and Engels themselves are our only authoritative sources to shed light on the issue of continuity of thought in Marx. If we make a thorough study of their writings, we will discover that they did not admit the existence of two Marxisms. On the contrary, many of their statements implied a belief in the essential unity of Marxism from the Manuscripts to the Capital. If Marx and Engels had supposed that there was a break between the Marxism of the Manuscripts and that of the Capital, they would never have spoken as they did about the relation of the latter to Hegelianism. Though Marx and Engels later avoided the philosophical language of their early years, and in the Manifesto of the Communist Party laughed at the German literati who "beneath the French criticism of the economic functions of money... wrote ‘Alienation of Humanity,’" they always recognized that "The German Working class movement is the heir of German classical philosophy." It is obvious that the problem of the continuity of Marx’s thought is bound up with his continuing interest in Hegel. His contemporaries may have been incapable of understanding Hegel, but Marx never lost his interest in him. Lenin himself lent some support to this view by writing in 1914:

> It is impossible fully to grasp Marx’s Capital, and especially the first chapter, if you have not studied and understood the whole of Hegel’s Logic. Consequently, none of the Marxists for the past half century has Engels, too, shared this view of Hegel’s importance.

In later life Marx cherished the thought of writing a short treatise on the Hegelian dialectic and his relation to it. However the famous passage in the 1873 preface to Capital was his only further word on the matter. There he said:

My dialectic method is not only different from the Hegelian, but is its direct opposite. The mystification which dialectic suffers in Hegel’s hands, by no means prevents him from being the first to present its general form of working in a comprehensive and conscious manner. With him it is standing on its head. It must be turned right side up again, if you would discover the rational kernel within the mystical shell.

In the same context Marx reminds us: "The mystifying side of Hegelian dialectic I criticized nearly thirty years ago, at a time when it was still the fashion." Here the reference is to the year 1844 and to the Manuscripts. This obscure reference to his unpublished Manuscripts is entirely understandable for us when we recall that he did indeed develop in them a systematic criticism of Hegel. Marx turned Hegelianism "right side up again", by reading Hegel in materialistic economic terms. This inversion of Hegel’s dialectic of history was the constitutive act of original Marxism. And now, in 1873, Marx describes it as the constitutive act of the mature Marxian dialectic. The implication is that he considered the Manuscripts as the birth place of mature Marxism, the founding documents of scientific socialism.

When Marx made the statement of the inversion of Hegelian dialectic in the 1873 preface to Capital, the Manuscripts had not been published, and their very existence remained unknown to the public. Naturally, his followers, or at least many of them, failed in making any sense out of his remarks about the genesis of scientific socialism out of German philosophy. The followers could only speculate in vain as to what he meant by the mysterious version of Hegel. Thus the false legend gradually arose that Marx’s early philosophical period was pre-Marxist, and that Marxism itself came into being only in the aftermath of his apparent break with German philosophy in the middle of 1840’s. Accordingly, his intellectual career was divided into a pre-Marxist early
If there was one theme running through the whole of Marx’s writings, the most obvious would be ‘alienation’, a concept that he developed through confrontation with Hegel. Whereas for Hegel alienation is a state of consciousness subject to elimination by another state of consciousness for Marx alienation is related to real, existing objects subject to elimination only in the real sphere of object-related activity. Marx’s critique of Hegel, in this connection, is that the abolition of alienation on the level of mere consciousness recognizes the immanent impossibility of abolishing real alienation. Hegel’s consciousness only approves a reality that it cannot change. Such a merely spiritual emancipation forces man to legitimize his chains. But Marx sees alienation as residing in a concrete relationship between man and his products, and hence his discussion on alienation is in materialistic terms. And yet, in spite of the materialistic tone, Marx’s writings are related to issues of general philosophical significance, and his later writings on economy and society are meaningful only within this wider context. Marx’s critique of the way in which Hegel handled the question of alienation restates Marx’s general critique of philosophical idealism, and the Marxian version of materialism emerges from this discussion of alienation. Marx’s views on alienation and his materialism are thus inseparable.

The continuity of Marx’s thought has been demonstrated beyond doubt by the publication of some of Marx’s notes, written in the six months from October 1857 to March 1858, under the title Foundations of the Critique of Political Economy. The time and place of their publication prevented their attracting attention and it was not until 1953 that there was an accessible edition. Questions that were important in Marx’s Manuscripts -- such as the true nature of labor and the resolution of the conflict between individual and community -- are taken up again in the Foundations and explained in detail. In the foundations Marx used the same argument which he used in the Manuscripts, arguing that the need to work does not constitute in itself a restriction of freedom, provided it is not alienated work. He also speaks of the ‘self-realization’ of the person, hence of true freedom. The Foundations then, is as Hegelian as the Manuscripts and in the light of that it is impossible to maintain that only Marx’s early writings are of philosophical interest and that he lost the humanist vision in the later writings.

The idea that the aim of human evolution is the unfolding of the human being, the creation of ‘wealthy’ human being who has overcome the contradiction between self and nature and achieved true freedom, is expressed in many passages of Capital, written by the mature and old Marx. He wrote in the third volume of the Capital:

Beyond it (the realm of necessity) begins that development of human energy which is an end in itself, the true realm of freedom, which, however, can blossom forth only with this realm of necessity as its basis. The shortening of the working day is its basic prerequisite.16

The concept of alienation is expressed in the Capital in these words:

...the character of independence and estrangement which the capitalist mode of production as a whole gives to the instruments of labor and to the product, as against the workman, is developed by means of machinery into a thorough antagonism.17

Thus the content of Capital is a continuation of Marx’s early thoughts. The main theme of the first volume of Capital, surplus value, rests on the equation of work and value that goes back to the conception of man as being who creates himself and the conditions of his life -- a conception outlined in the Manuscripts.18 It is man’s nature -- according to the Manuscripts -- to be constantly developing himself and the world around him in cooperation with other men. What Marx in Capital is describing is how this fundamental nature of human being -- to be the initiator and controller of historical process -- has been transferred or alienated and how it belongs to the inhuman power of capital. The counterpart of alienated man, the unalienated or ‘total man of the Manuscripts, also appears in Capital. In the chapter of "Machinery and Modern Industry" in Capital, Marx makes the same contrast between the effects of alienated and unalienated modes of production on the development of human personality. In other parts of Capital, Marx speaks of the importance of producing "fully developed human beings,"19 "the full development of human race",20 man’s "necessity to develop himself",21 and of the "fragment of a man" as the result of the process of alienation.22

The section of Capital that most recalls the early writings is the final section of the first chapter of volume I, entitled ‘The Fetishism of Commodities and the Secret Thereof’. The Whole section is reminiscent of the section on alienated labor in the Manuscripts.

Marx writes:

A commodity is therefore a mysterious thing, simply because in it the social character of man’s labor appears to them as an objective character stamped upon the product of that labor; because the relation of the producers to the sum total of their own labor is presented to them as a social relation, existing not between themselves, but between the products of their labor. This is the reason why the products of labor become commodities, social things whose qualities are at the same time perceptible and imperceptible by the senses.

Marx, then, draws a parallel between alienated labor and religion:

In order, therefore, to find an analogy, we must have recourse to the mist-enveloped regions of the religious world. In that world the productions of the human brain appear as independent beings endowed with life, and entering into relation both with one another and the human race. So it is in the world of commodities with the products of men’s hands. This I call Fetishism which attaches itself to the products of labor, as soon as they are produced as commodities, and which is therefore inseparable from the production of commodities.

From this point of view, Capital is a detailed study of the economic aspects of the process outlined by Marx in his Manuscripts. What was philosophically postulated in 1844 is now verified and vindicated by an analysis of capitalist economic activity undertaken with the tools of classical political economy.

Marx never repudiated the idea of alienation in its human sense rather he claimed that it cannot be divorced from the concrete and real life process of the alienated individual. Marx criticized capitalism precisely because it destroyed individual personality, just as he criticized "crude communism" for the same reason. As Erich Fromm has pointed out, the statement (of Marx) that history can be explained only by class consciousness is a statement of fact, as far as previous history is concerned, not an expression of Marx’s disregard of the individual.\textsuperscript{26}

It should be remembered that \textit{Capital} is only an unfinished fragment of the task that Marx set himself. In the preface to the \textit{Manuscripts} he had outlined the program of his life’s work:

\begin{quote}
I shall therefore publish the critique of law, ethics, politics, etc., in a series of distinct independent pamphlets, and afterwards showing the inter relationship of the separate parts, together with a critique of the speculative elaboration of that material. For this reason it will be found that the interconnection between political economy and the state, law, ethics, civil life, etc., is touched upon in the present work only to the extent to which political economy itself \textit{ex professo} (expressly) touches upon these subjects.\textsuperscript{27}
\end{quote}

But Marx never got beyond his first ‘pamphlet’ on political economy. Had he finished the whole work he intended to do, we could have received much more insights into the humanistic vision of the mature Marx.

Marx never gave up his concept of the essence of the human being. This point will be understood better when we examine the \textit{Manuscripts} where Marx decided that human self-alienation could and should be grasped as a social relation between human beings. ‘Only man himself can be this alien power over man, he said, but this relation of man to himself takes practical shape as a relation between the alienated worker and another man outside him, i.e., the capitalist.’ In this way the inner conflict of the alienated human being became, in Marx’s mind, a social conflict between "labor" and "capital," and the alienated species-self became the class divided society. Thus, self-alienation was projected as a social phenomenon.

One of the passages of \textit{The Holy Family}, written in the so-called transitional period (1845), illustrates this point quite vividly:

\begin{quote}
The propertied class and the class of the proletariat present the same human self-alienation. But the former class finds in the self-alienation its confirmation and its good, its own power: it has in it a semblance of human existence. The class of the proletariat feels annihilated in its self-alienation: it sees in its own powerlessness and the reality of an inhuman existence.\(^{28}\)

Society is here envisaged as a self-system whose inner dynamics are those of alienation. The antagonistic classes are collective expressions of the conflicting forces of the self-system. The proletariat and the capitalist class, or labor and capital, are opposite sides of "the same human self-alienation".

Marx sees in society a self-system in conflict. To put it differently, that which he sees presents itself to him from now on simply as ‘society’. Thus in his short work Wage Labour and Capital (1847) he asserts:

> To say that the interests of capital and those of the workers are one and the same is only to say that capital and wage labor are two sides of one and the same relation. The one conditions the other, just as usurer and squanderer condition each other.\(^{29}\)

"The same human self-alienation" has now become simply "the same relation". Marx also describes labor power as a commodity that its possessor, the worker, surrenders to capital, and declares:

> the exercise of labor power, labor, is the worker’s own life-activity, the manifestation of his own life. And this life-activity he sells to another person in order to secure the necessary means of subsistence. Thus his life-activity is for him only a means to enable him to exist. He works in order to live. He does not even reckon labor as part of his life, it is rather a sacrifice of his life.\(^{30}\)

Here is the picture of the alienated labor given in the Manuscripts, the only difference being that Marx no longer calls it alienated labor, but simply wage labor. He now apprehends the alienated self-relation as a social relation of labor and capital, and on this basis he can say that "Capital is... not a personal, it is a social power".\(^{31}\)

This makes it clear why Marx proceeded in the Manifesto of the Communist Party to formulate Marxism without explicit reference to the concepts of man and his self-alienation, and why he here scornfully dismissed the whole notion of "man in general" as unreal. For him there was no longer any generic man, and hence no longer any use for the idea of man’s self-alienation. The alienated self-relation had transformed itself into an alienated social relation, and ‘man’ was just the ‘ensemble’ of such relations. Man had been split into two. There were left only the dissociated antagonistic parts, the ‘worker’ and capitalist’, neither of them wholly human. Society itself was splitting down the center into two hostile camps of workers and capitalists. It appeared that the realities were the warring classes themselves, and so it had always been: "The history of all hitherto existing society is the history of class struggles".\textsuperscript{32} It was absurd of the German literati to espouse the misty cause of mankind.\textsuperscript{33} The only real and pressing issue was that of which side to take, labor’s or capital’s, in the ongoing class struggle. Thus the Marxism of the \textit{Manifesto} evolves directly out of the Marxism of the \textit{Manuscripts}. What he sees is still the process of self-alienation, but he sees it as a social process. Alienation remains his central theme, but it has gone underground in his image of society.

In spite of certain changes in mood and language, the Core of the philosophy developed by the young Marx was never changed. It is impossible to understand his concept of socialism, and his criticism of capitalism as developed in his later writings except on the basis of the concept of the human being which he developed in his early writings. The ‘young’ and the ‘old’ Marx are essentially one and the same -- Marx the fighter against self-alienation dehumanization and exploitation, Marx the combatant for the full humanization of man, for the many sided development of man’s human possibilities, for the abolition of class society and for the realization of an association in which "the free development of each is the condition for the free development of all".\textsuperscript{34}

This does not mean, however, that Marx’s views never changed, but rather that there are not two fundamentally different and mutually unconnected Marx. Marx’s thought was constantly changing (in the sense that it was developing), but there were not such turns in this process as would represent a complete break with former ideas and the passage to entirely different or even opposite conceptions. The young Marx is not an abstract philosopher, nor is the old Marx a stem scientist. Marx’s thought from beginning to end is a revolutionary humanism, and only when it is considered as a whole can it serve as an adequate theoretical basis of the revolutionary struggle for a democratic, humanistic socialism. It is in the light of this fundamental coherence of his thought that we should examine Marx’s critique of religion.

Notes:

14. Trans. by Martin Nicolaus (Middlesex, England: Penguin Books Ltd., 1973). It should be noted that this title is not Marx’s, but stems from the first editors of these notes. It was published for the first time in Moscow in 1939. It is generally known as the Grundrisse, obviously, from the first word of the German title. These notes amount to almost one thousand pages which actually served Marx as a basis both for his Critique of Political Economy (1859) and Capital (1867).

15. See, for example Ibid., p.163ff, 831ff.

20. Ibid., p. 505f.

21. Ibid., p. 513.

22. Ibid., p. 645.

25. Ibid.

27. Manuscripts, p. 63.

29. Marx Engels, Selected works, op. cit, p. 84.
30. Ibid., p. 75.

32. Ibid., p. 35.

33. Cf. Ibid., p. 56f

Chapter 3: Influence of Hegel and Feuerbach on Marx

In the preceding chapter we found that in spite of his critical approach to Hegelian philosophy Marx never lost interest in Hegel, and that the problem of the continuity of Marx’s thought was bound up with his continuing interest in Hegel. Marx’s criticism of religion can only be understood against this background of Hegelian philosophy, and also of the anthropology of Feuerbach, which it extends and supersedes. Therefore, in this chapter we shall discuss to what extent Marx’s critique of religion was influenced by Hegel and Feuerbach. The great merit of Hegel’s philosophy wrote Engels, was that for the first time the whole world, natural, historical, intellectual, is represented as a process, i.e., as in constant motion, change, transformation, development and the attempt is made to trace out the internal connection that makes a continuous whole of all this movement and development.¹

It is impossible to give an adequate account of the ideas of so complex a thinker in so short a space. What is aimed at here is a very brief discussion of those aspects of Hegel’s thought which Marx took seriously for his own critique of religion. It is also to be kept in mind that the Hegel whom we are considering is Hegel as seen through the eyes of Marx and Engels, and hence we must place this qualification upon our reference to Hegel.

Hegel started from the belief that, as he said of the French Revolution, man's existence centres in his head, i.e., in thought, inspired by which he builds up the world of reality". In his greatest work, the Phenomenology of Mind, Hegel traces the development of mind or spirit (Geist), reintroducing historical movement into philosophy and asserting that the human mind can attain to absolute knowledge. He analyzes the development of human consciousness, from its immediate perception of the here and now, to the stage of self-consciousness, the understanding that allows man to analyze the world and order his own actions accordingly. Following this is the stage of reason itself, understanding of the real, after which spirit, by means of religions and art, attains the absolute knowledge, the level at which man recognizes in the world the stages of his own reason. Hegel calls these stages 'alienation', in so far as they are creations of the human mind yet thought of as independent and superior to the human mind. This absolute knowledge is at the same time a sort of recapitulation of the human spirit, for each successive stage retains elements of the previous ones as it goes beyond them.

Hegel also talked of "the power of the negative", thinking that there was always a tension between any present state of affairs and what it was becoming. For any present state of affairs was in the process of being negated, changed into something else. This process was what Hegel meant by dialectic.

Hegel’s views on religion played a vital role in the formation of his thought. Religion, together with philosophy, was for him the highest from of man’s spiritual life. Religion was the return of the Absolute Idea to itself. The content of religion was the same as that of philosophy, though its method of apprehending was different. For whereas philosophy employed concepts, religion used imagination. These unsatisfactory imaginings afforded only a fragmentary and imprecise knowledge of what philosophy comprehended rationally. But religion could be linked to philosophy by means of a philosophy of religion, and Hegel considered that the particular dogmatic contents of the religious imagination were necessary stages in the development of Absolute Spirit. The philosophy of religion interpreted at a higher level both naive faith and critical reason. Thus Hegel rejected the view of the eighteenth century rationalists that religion did inadequately what only science was competent to do. According to him, religion (or his philosophical interpretation of it) fulfilled man’s constant psychological need to have an image of himself and of the world by which he could orient himself.
Encounter in Humanization: Insights for Christian-Marxist Dialogue and Cooperation

Also for Hegel, the acceptance of a certain form of religion conditions the development of a corresponding form of political community: a people’s idea of God determines what they are, and accordingly the form of their states. Hegel said:

A people’s idea of God determines its relationship with God and its idea of itself; so a religion is also a people’s concept of itself. A people having nature for its God cannot be a free people; not until it thinks of God as a spirit above nature is itself a spirit and free.

According to Hegel, therefore, religion forms the "basis" upon which a superstructure is raised. Only with Christianity did a free state become possible, because only then was the "unlimited right of the personality" recognized, but this potential was only fully realized in Protestantism.

Hegelian philosophy leaves a number of open questions as far as the importance, nature and position of religion in real life is concerned. One of the questions is: Has religion an independent existence -- apart from the human being and society. or is it merely the objectified form in which the union of subjective and objective spirit is seen by people at a given stage, in which they imagine, feel, or understand this union? Another question that comes out of the Hegelian treatment of the subject is: Has the religious idea any value of its own apart from "absolute knowledge", speculative wisdom, or is it only to be accepted as a temporarily unavoidable consequence of the defective philosophical education of the majority of social classes? The suggestion of an elite in Hegel’s speculative philosophy is attacked by many, especially Bruno Bauer and his friends. Hegel said: "The content of religion and philosophy is the same, but religion is the truth for all mankind."

This distinction between an esoteric form of truth accessible to all, and an esoteric form reserved for philosophers was again contested by the radical theologians of the time.

After Hegel’s death differences of opinion began to occur within the Hegelian school that were to lead eventually to a split between "Right Hegelians" and "Left Hegelians". These terms were used to designate... religious attitudes. The right of the school held to the slogan "the real is the rational", and saw nothing irrational in the traditional representation of religion. They considered that the major representations of religion -- the transcendental personality of God, the uniqueness of Christ, the individual immortality of the soul, etc. were part of its essential content. Thus they upheld the Hegelian doctrine of the unity of philosophy and religion. The left Hegelians could not admit this unity; they began to ask whether Hegel was not really a pantheist. Questions began to be asked about the personality of God and the immortality of the soul. Hegel’s teaching on these points was not clear, and the verbal tradition of his lectures often varied. ‘The principle that the Left Hegelians held to was that "the rational is the real". Thus the left side of the school opposed the Right’s optimism with a pessimism that set out to destroy the dogmas enshrined in religious representations that were now outdated. In Germany religion and politics were very much connected in those days. Naturally, the Left Hegelians paved the way for a movement of religious criticism which would swiftly become secularized into one of political opposition. It was as a member of this rapidly changing movement that Marx first began to work out his views on philosophy and society.

He joined a sort of Hegelian discussion group: "Through several meetings with friends in Stralow I became a member of a Doctor’s Club." It was here Marx got acquainted with Bruno Bauer, the leading light in the club, who had been lecturing in theology at the university since 1834.

This conversion to Hegelianism, however, did not last for long. Marx’s doctoral dissertation begun towards the end of 1838 and submitted in April 1841, reveals his growing disagreement with Hegel. The dissertation, entitled "The Difference Between the Democritean and Epicurean Philosophy of Nature", consisted of a criticism of those who had equated the natural philosophies of Democritus and Epicurus and a catalogue of the differences between these philosophies. Marx’s choice of the subject for the dissertation was destined to throw light on the contemporary post-Hegelian situation in philosophy by the examination of a parallel period in the history of Greek philosophy.

In discussing the difference between the natural philosophies of Democritus and Epicurus, Marx favoured the latter. He found Epicurus’ concept of the atom superior to Democritus’ more empirical view because it implied independence, freedom, and an "energizing principle" for experience. Marx begins his account of the relationship of the two philosophers with a paradox: Epicurus held all appearances to be objectively real but at the same time, since he wished to conserve freedom of the will, denied that the world was governed by immutable laws and thus in fact seemed to decry the objective reality of nature. Democritus, on the other hand, was very skeptical about the reality of appearance, but yet held the world to be governed by necessity. From this Marx concludes that Epicurus’ physics was really only a part of his moral philosophy. He did not merely copy Democritus’ physics, as was commonly thought, but introduced the idea of spontaneity into the movement of the atoms, and to the Democritus world of inanimate nature ruled by mechanical laws he added a world of animate nature in which the human will operated. Marx thus favours the views of Epicurus for two reasons: firstly, his emphasis on absolute autonomy of the human spirit has freed human beings from all superstitions of transcendent objects; secondly, the emphasis on "free individual self-consciousness" shows one way of going beyond the system of a "total philosophy".

In an extended note that he added to his dissertation at the end of 1841, Marx claims that Hegel inverted the traditional proofs for the existence of God and thereby refuted them. Whereas traditional theology said: "Since contingency truly exists, God exists," Hegel turned this into: "Since contingency does not exist, God or the absolute does." Marx, then, poses a dilemma. The first possibility is that the proofs for the existence of God are "empty tautologies," like the ontological argument which Marx stated in the form: "What I conceive for myself as actual is an actual conception for me." In that case any gods would have an equal reality.

The second possibility is that

The proofs for the existence of God are nothing but proofs for the existence of the essentially human self-consciousness and logical explication of it. Take the ontological argument. What existence is immediate in being thought? Self-consciousness?

Marx claims that in this sense all proofs for the existence of God are proofs for his non-existence.

In the previous chapter we found Marx’s observation that in Hegel the dialectic stood on its head. For Hegel, the self-development of thought is the real movement and facts are only reflections of this superior reality. As for Marx, the dialectical movement is merely a reflection of the actual development of the real world. So Marx set out to put the dialectic back on its feet. Dialectical laws, he maintains, are abstracted from facts. For him, the dialectic is a matter of social relation. The moments of opposition are objective conditions independent of thought. The opposing elements are classes; moments of opposition become revolutionary phases of development.

The Hegelian relationship of spirit and the world become the Marxian notion of the relationship of man to his social being. Marx says that Hegel only takes account of man’s mental activities, i.e., of his ideas, and that these, though important, are by themselves insufficient to explain social and cultural change.

As Sydney Hook has pointed out,

If for Hegel history is a progressive realization of freedom, for Marx it is a progressive development toward the socialisation of the means of life. Without such socialisation, freedom is a fetish -- an empty, formal right which cannot be exercised.

To sum up how Marx differed from Hegel: Hegel wanted to provide an idealist (spiritual) philosophy of all reality. This philosophy was intended to comprehend reality as it was, i.e., as it had become. So Hegel took the world into his political philosophy and made of it an object of thought. Hegel thought then became a confirmation of the world, because in it the world was justified as and for what it was. Against this materialism of descent Marx posited human self-consciousness as the determinant of the form of government. Marx wanted to comprehend reality as it already, and of itself, pointed to the future; he looked in the present reality for the seeds of the reality to come. History could not stay put in the present state of affairs, but had always to move on in the direction of future rationality. Rationality lay in the future as that which ought to be pursued, and was in striking contrast to present reality. Thus the path which history must follow is a dialectical one.

Whereas Hegel’s dialectic was one of concepts, Marx’s dialectic was one of social forces. While Hegel remained in a world of abstract ideas, Marx turned back to concrete reality. It is to be noted here that though Marx reacted against Hegel’s idealism, his reaction was not one of materialism. It is true that Marx used the term materialism for his own thought, but even in his later writings Marx didn’t use it in the formal sense of the word. Marx’s materialism is concerned not with matter in the physical and chemical sense, but with the human being who influences nature through the work process. He wanted to eliminate the opposition between a supernatural and a natural reality. The supernatural reality could be one of God, or of ideas, or of religion, or of metaphysics -- and it is this ideal reality which was rejected by Marx. The spirit which does exist is the human spirit, bodily spirit; and according to Marx, there is no other. From the beginning to the end of his thinking and writing Marx made use of Hegel’s dialectical method, and he continued to urge his followers to study Hegel. However, we should keep it in mind that he accepted only Hegel’s method but rejected the content of Hegel’s philosophy. He regarded Hegel as standing outside reality. Marx looked for the reality in man -- man as he actually is, set in this world, equipped with all his needs and desires. The human being had to change the circumstances of life; and to make the world a human world. Marx rejected the philosophy which was only contemplation, but retained the philosophy which actually intervened in the world.

It is against this background that Marx’s enthusiastic reception of Feuerbach’s philosophy is to be understood. Marx’s profound interest in Feuerbach can be found in a short note that he wrote in 1842 entitled, "Luther as Arbiter between Strauss and Feuerbach". In this note he cited at length a passage from Luther to support Feuerbach’s humanist interpretation of miracles as against the transcendent view of Strauss.

Marx depended very much on Feuerbach for his own criticism of Hegelian philosophy. Every page of the critique of Hegel’s political philosophy that Marx elaborated during the summer of 1843 shows the influence of Feuerbach’s method. In his "Critique of the Hegelian Dialectic and Philosophy as a Whole"¹⁴ Marx discusses the various attitudes of the Young Hegelians to Hegel, and singles out Feuerbach as the only constructive thinker. Feuerbach was the only one of Hegel’s disciples who had been able to come to terms with Hegel’s dialectic. Marx said:

Feuerbach is the only one who has a serious, critical attitude to the Hegelian dialectic and who has made genuine discoveries in this field. He is in fact the true conqueror of the old philosophy. The extent of his achievement, and the unpretentious simplicity with which he, Feuerbach, gives it to the world, stand in striking contrast to the opposite attitude of the others.\(^{15}\)

Engels also shared this view. Reminiscing in later years about Feuerbach’s magnum opus, The Essence of Christianity, Engels remarked:

> Then came Feuerbach’s Essence of Christianity. With one blow it pulverized the contradiction in that without circumlocutions it placed materialism on the throne again... One must oneself have experienced the liberating effects of this book to get an idea of it. Enthusiasm was general; we all became Feuerbachians. How enthusiastically Marx greeted the new conception and how much -- in spite of all critical reservations -- he was influenced by it, one may read in The Holy Family.\(^{16}\)

What was this great message of Feuerbach which had such a significant influence on Marx and Engels? Feuerbach abolishes the "theological essence" of religion in favour of its anthropological essence, reducing it precisely to the non-spiritual form which Hegel attacked as being mere "feeling". As Karl Lowith argues,

> Feuerbach’s ‘essence’ of Christianity is not a critical destruction of Christian theology and Christianity, but an attempt to preserve the essential part of Christianity, specifically in the form of a religious ‘anthropology’.\(^{17}\)

The axiom of Feuerbach’s criticism of religion is that anthropology is the mystery of Christian theology: "Man is the God of Christianity, Anthropology the mystery of Christian theology."\(^{18}\) The task of anthropology is to awaken human being to the truth of religion and to eliminate its falsity: to show that the consciousness of God is the consciousness of the species, and that what the human being adores is self. The true view of the human being is the reverse of the religious view, since

> That which in religion holds the first place-namely, God
is, ... in itself and according to truth, the second, for it is only the nature of man regarded objectively; and that which to religion is second -- namely, man -- must therefore be constituted and declared the first. 19

This means that the essence of religion is the essence of the human being. Religion is an ‘objectification’ of human being’s primitive essential needs; it has no particular content of its own. Properly understood, the knowledge of God is man’s knowledge of himself, but knowledge which is as yet unaware of its own nature. "Religion is man’s earliest and also indirect form of self-knowledge,"20 a detour taken by man on the way to finding himself.

According to Feuerbach, both religion and Hegelian philosophy have deprived the human being of natural absoluteness. Actually, Hegelianism is only religion brought to reason. Claiming that God is different from man and, accordingly, that man’s divinity is something to be achieved, both religion and Hegelian philosophy have alienated man from his very essence. They ascribe human being’s own highest perfection to a being different from the human being, to someone who does not even so much as exist. Therefore the more they exalt the ‘absolute’, the more they degrade the human being. That is why Feuerbach said: "The more empty life Is, the fuller, the more concrete is God. The impoverishing of the real world and the enriching of God is one act. Only the poor man has a rich God."21

The intention of Feuerbach’s critical philosophy is to break down both theology and speculative philosophy into anthropology. Not only religious consciousness, but also its sublimated philosophical form, Hegelian speculation, must be exposed as false consciousness. In contrast, actual material human being is taken as the positive starting point, and the "I-Thou" relationship and love as the fundamental social aspect. Positivism is chosen as the methodical principle.

This is the precise opposite of the formula in which Hegel’s speculative philosophy had expressed the relationship between God’s self-knowledge and man’s consciousness of God.

In the Essence of Christianity there is another indication of a theory of the origins of religion. Feuerbach says:
Nature listens not to the plaints of man, it is callous to his sorrows. Hence man turns away from Nature, from all visible objects. He turns within, that here, sheltered and hidden from the inexorable powers, he may find audience for his griefs. Here he utters his oppressive secrets; here he gives vent to his stifled sighs. This open-air of the heart, this outspoken secret, this uttered sorrow of the soul, is God. God is a tear of love, shed in the deepest concealment over human misery. "God is an unutterable sigh, lying in the depths of the heart."\(^{22}\)

Later we will find that some of the comments Marx makes on religion and God are reminiscent of this statement of Feuerbach.

In short we have two sources from which religious concepts spring according to Feuerbach. First, there is the intellectual side, which consists of the inability of the individual to attribute to oneself the human qualities of the endlessly self-perfecting species. Then there is the emotional side, which consists of the inability to comfort oneself in any other way in the pain and sorrow which are an integral part of human existence.

Feuerbach believes that Christianity is opposed to the entire situation of the modern world. Christianity is negated even by those who continue to believe firmly in it. It is denied in life and in science, in art and in industry. If, in practice, the individual and work have replaced the Christian and prayer, theoretically the essence of the human being must replace the divine. Christianity has been reduced to a Sunday affair, it has vanished out of the everyday life of the human being, because

\[
\text{it is nothing more than a fixed idea, in flagrant contradiction with our fire and life assurance companies, our railroads and steam carriages, our picture and sculpture galleries, our military and industrial schools, our theaters and scientific museums.}^{23}\]

For Feuerbach the criticism of religion is justified, because in divesting God of the good qualities of the human species falsely attributed to God, it enriches and liberates humankind. Like all rationalist philosophers of the time, Feuerbach tends to believe that the act of liberation can be brought about through a simple reformation of people’s consciousness.
To sum up Feuerbach’s critique of religion: The real world, the world which counts, is found right here in the material things available to our senses and passions. Man has a certain distinctive reality of his own, in this sensuous world. He is able to communicate, and to engage in common projects. Man has a community type of existence due to the sharing of aims and passions. In this community he develops certain ideals. He wants to protect those ideals when they are under attack from bad social conditions. Therefore, he projects them, separates them from himself, or, in terms of Hegel’s dialectic, he alienates them from his everyday existence. He puts his moral ideals at a great distance from himself and regards them as a separate reality, or as God. Therefore, the content and substance of religion are entirely human. The key to the mystery of the divine being is the human being, the secret of theology is anthropology. In religion man projects his own nature or nature itself into something superhuman and supernatural Feuerbach reverses the biblical statement "God created man in his own image" into man created God in his own image. He says: "Man first unconsciously and involuntarily creates God in his own image, and after this God consciously and voluntarily creates man in his own image". What we have to do, says Feuerbach, is to recover the purely human meaning of religion. We have to bring religion back to its proper proportions as an expression of human moral aspirations.

Now let us see how far Marx agreed with Feuerbach and in which sense he may be said to have differed from Feuerbach. Marx repudiated Feuerbach because the latter took as the basis of his philosophy an abstract human being, i.e., human being apart from his world. According to Marx, Feuerbach’s only uncontested merit was his reduction of the absolute spirit to human terms. By his definition of human nature as a naturalistic generic entity, Feuerbach "pushed Hegel aside" without "overcoming him critically". He constructed a human being whose reality reflects only the life of the bourgeois private individual.

Marx agreed with Feuerbach’s claim that both religion and speculative philosophy are forms of the "alienations of man’s essence", but he disagreed with Feuerbach’s claim that the human nature underlying this alienation is fully developed, untainted and divine. On the other hand, though rejecting Hegel’s idealism, Marx agreed with Hegel that history had not yet become the "real history of man -- of man as a given subject, but only man’s actor of creation -- the story of man’s origin." In short, the divinity, or rather the humanity, of the human being is something still to be achieved and always to be the result of an achievement. Hence Marx wrote in 1844:

For Germany the criticism of religion is in the main complete, and criticism of religion is the premise of all criticism. The only practically possible liberation of Germany is liberation from the standpoint of the theory which proclaims man to be the highest essence of man.

In the same year he again wrote:

Since for the socialist man the entire so-called history of the world is nothing but the creation of man through human labour, nothing but the emergence of nature for man, so he has the visible, irrefutable proof of his birth through himself, of the process of his creation.

Therefore, it is legitimate to say, as Nicholas Lobkowicz points out, that Marx’s philosophy of man is a materialist interpretation of Hegel’s Phenomenology rather than a pendant of Feuerbach’s anthropotheistic materialism.

Marx’s most significant criticism of Feuerbach is that the latter interpreted reality, but did not change it. In other words, his thought stayed at a theoretical level, and never became praxis. As a result Feuerbach remained stuck in the individualism of bourgeois society. Though he saw religion as a projection, he was unable to explain it in terms of the needs of humanity alienated from itself by the social structure. Hence Marx wrote in his Theses on Feuerbach:

The standpoint of the old materialism is ‘civil’ society; the standpoint of the new is human society, or socialized humanity. The philosophers have only interpreted the world, in various ways; the point, however, is to change it.

With this philosophical background, Marx started his own critique of religion which he hoped would pave the way for changing the world.
Notes:

2. Philosophy of History. Trans by J. Sibree (New York, P.F. Collier & Son, MCMI)

5. By religion Hegel meant Protestant Christianity, which he considered the highest and final form of religion. He remained a Lutheran all his life.

7. Ibid., p. 135.

9. Cf. David McLellan, Marx before Marxism. op. cit. p.52 ff

11. Ibid.

12. Ibid., p. 65f.

15. Ibid., p. 172.

Bishop Paulose Mar Paulsoe prefers to call himself a "secular theologian" because he communicates the Christian faith in secular language. He received his Ph.D. from Princeton Theological Seminary for a dissertation on Bonhoeffer's corrective of Karl Marx. He was a Bishop in the Chaldean Syrian Church in Kerala, India and served as President of the World Student Christian Federation. Published by Christava Sahitya Samithy (CSS), Tiruvalla-689 101, Kerala, S. India. This material was prepared for Religion Online by Ted and Winnie Brock.

Chapter 4: Marx's Critique of Religion

Aristotle said that to understand a thing one must study its origins. Before expounding Marx's critique of religion, let us first inquire what kind of religious influence Marx had at home and during the school days.

Marx's father, Hirschel Marx, a lawyer, was a descendant of a respected family of rabbis. And yet, in 1816, when the edict went out from the Prussian government that no one of the Jewish faith could serve as a lawyer or an apothecary within the kingdom, Hirschel Marx abandoned his Jewish faith and embraced Protestantism. He entered the Evangelical Church as a convert and received the name Heinrich Marx. Nominally a Christian, he was a free thinker who attended church regularly, sang hymns and paid his tithes. He was prepared to conform to the outward form of the church, but did not believe that any faith was superior to any other. In his view Stoicism, Judaism, Christianity and Hinduism were all equally valid and equally vulnerable. In a letter sent to Karl Marx while he was a student in Bonn, Heinrich Marx said:

A good support for morality is a simple faith in God. You know that I am the last person to be a fanatic. But sooner or later a man has a real need of this faith, and there are moments in life when even the man who denies God is compelled against his will to pray to the Almighty... everyone should submit to what was the faith of Newton, Locke and Leibniz.¹

In other words, he professed a belief in reason. His belief in God restricted itself to an acknowledgment of a supreme moral value. Like the poet Heinrich Heine, he considered the sacrament of baptism only as "an entrance card into the community of European culture".

Karl Marx’s mother, Henrietta Pressborck, also came from Jewish background. Her father was a well-respected rabbi in Holland. At the time when her husband accepted the Christian faith, her father was still living and therefore she postponed her joining the church. She was baptized in 1825 after her father’s death. Unlike her husband she was not educated, and spent most of her time as a good housekeeper.

Karl Marx was born of these parents on May 5, 1818 at Trier in the Rhine province of Prussia. He was the third of the nine children in the family. He received baptism in the Evangelical church on August 26, 1824 and was solemnly confirmed on March 23, 1834. But in a family where baptism was considered only as "an entrance card into the community of European culture, these religious ceremonies did not mean much. In his childhood he lived a leisurely life of ease and bourgeois respectability, with wealth and servants at his disposal. His mother never bestowed upon him anything comparable to a religious education. He had special affection toward his father with whom he read Voltaire and Rousseau. At the home of Baron von Westphalen, his neighbour and later father-in-law, he began to appreciate Homer and Shakespeare.

Contrary to most of the Young Hegelians, Marx never went through a period of "religiousness". People like Hegel, Feuerbach and Bruno Bauer who influenced Marx began their career as students of theology. All of them came from middle-class Protestant families which tried to educate their children as good Christians. Even Engels grew up in a pietist family. Marx, on the contrary, grew up among men to whom religion never was more than a question of propriety or of expediency. The only place where he might have come into contact with practising Christians was the Friedrich Wilhelm Gymnasium in Trier which he attended for five years.

Since Marx’s ideas were to have such a revolutionary impact on the world, it is important to watch them as they first rose to the surface. Some of the essays he wrote for his Abitur, the German school leaving examination, permit us to watch them while they were being formed. Because these essays reflect his religious attitude, and because many of the ideas he presented to his teachers were to be enlarged and given greater resonance in later years, they now deserve our attention.

The essay for German composition, Reflections of a Youth on Choosing a Vocation involves a careful study of the purposes of life and human being’s proper duty to fellow human beings. Given free will, a man must strive for an occupation in which he can do the greatest good for the greatest number, and he gravely points out the dangers of alienation and self-deception. It is interesting to note that he employs the word "vocation" (Beruf) almost in the sense of a profession of faith. The task given to the human being is to choose a way of life which will best serve the human race. He writes:

> To man... the Deity gave a general goal, to improve mankind and himself, but left it up to him to seek the means by which he can attain this goal, left it up to him to choose the position in society which is most appropriate and from which he can best elevate both himself and society.2

Free will, the commandment of God, the ennoblement of mankind are all implied in the theme which will eventually encompass the whole field of human conduct. We shall not understand Marx unless we realize that when he became a revolutionary, he was carrying out the injunctions of his youthful essay, for he felt that he was choosing the position in society in which he could best serve humanity.

The essay on religion was titled "The Union of the Faithful with Christ, according to St. John 15:1-14, presented in its Reason and Essence, in its Absolute Necessity and its Effects." Marx notices that corruption and alienation are present in humankind to an intolerable and terrifying degree. No matter how much human beings strive, they know themselves to be incapable of achieving their purpose without divine help. So he depicts human beings as creatures at the mercy of their vices, saved only by the mercy of God. Without God people are helpless; with God they become divine. Marx points out that the ultimate proof of this assertion is found in the word of Christ himself in the parable of the Vine and Branches. By loving God, he wrote, human beings find themselves turning toward their brothers and sisters and sacrificing themselves for others. Instead of alienation there is the loving bondage of service and sacrifice. He continues:

Thus the union with Christ means a most intimate and vital companionship with him, keeping Him before our eyes and in our hearts, and being permeated by the highest love, so that we can turn our hearts, toward our brothers, united with us through Him, and for whom He had sacrificed himself. But this love for Christ is not fruitless; it fills us not only with the purest reverence and highest respect for Him, but also has the effect of making us keep his commandment in that we sacrifice ourselves for each other and are virtuous, but virtuous only out of love for him.3

In this way Marx resolves the theme of virtue by defining it in both divine and human terms, simultaneously bringing divinity down to earth and raising humanity to the level of divine. According to Marx, Christian virtue, being free of all earthly attachments, acts as God’s agent in the redemption of mankind. By virtue human beings become divine, while in no way losing their humanity. In fact virtue makes them only more human, more loving, and more understanding.

Marx was a Christian, and when he turned against Christianity, as Robert Payne observes, he brought to his ideas of social justice the same passion for atonement and same horror of alienation which characterize this essay.4

In his dissertation Marx provided the stimulus for the development of a materialistic-atheistic tradition by setting up the titanic figure of Prometheus as the archetype. When the twenty-three year old Marx called Prometheus "the most eminent saint and martyr in the philosophic calendar", he had in mind a philosophy with the basic creed: "In simple words I hate the pack of gods". According to Marx, Prometheus is opposed to "all divine and earthly Gods who do not acknowledge human self-consciousness as the highest divinity." Marx’s philosophic calendar therefore contains such a "saint and martyr" who hates the gods and extol human being’s self-consciousness as the highest divinity. The phrase "saint and martyr" should be understood as an interpretation of Prometheus’ answer to Hermes which Marx quotes:
In preference to Hermes’ servitude as faithful boy to Father Zeus, Prometheus would rather be the "servant to this rock" to which he is bound by way of punishment. Prometheus profession is the service of human beings over against Hermes service of the gods. The latter enjoys an apparent freedom, whereas the former is subjected to eternal sufferings and bondage. But in these sufferings and bondage he is free, because it is his own conscious and deliberate choice. His martyrdom for the sake of human beings makes him the real saint. Prometheus thus becomes the representative of a view of human beings and the world that sets up their own self-consciousness as the ultimate reality and supreme good. Prometheus’ act is, according to Marx, the true task of philosophy. Just as Prometheus, having stolen fire from heaven, begins to build houses and to establish himself on earth, so philosophy, having embraced the whole world, should rebel against the world of phenomena.

In the Contribution to the Critique of Hegel’s Philosophy of Right: Introduction, we find another reference to the tragic aspects of Prometheus’ act. There, the gods of Greece are said to have already been "tragically wounded to death in Aeschylus’ Prometheus Bound." In other words, the real victim in the tragedy is not the human saint and martyr Prometheus, but rather the gods whose dominance has been fatally undermined by the disbelief of human beings.

Prometheus’ challenging answer to Hermes, the servant of gods, is applied to the actual political situation at the time of writing the dissertation, i.e., March 1841. At this time the government had begun to withdraw the semi-official support it used to give to the young Hegelians. It encouraged the theological faculty of Bonn to reject the appointment of Marx’s friend Bruno Bauer, one of the leading figures among the Young Hegelians, as professor. Thus, by the "poor March hares, who rejoice over the apparently worsened social position of philosophy", Marx meant all those in the universities who collaborated with the government by interfering in the academic freedom of the Young Hegelian philosophers. The political servitude of the theological faculty is compared by Marx to Hermes’ servitude to Father Zeus. Prometheus’ challenging answer to Hermes should therefore be read as an indirect assault on the analogous position of Christianity in the nineteenth century.

In the foregoing paragraphs we found that Marx’s critical attitude toward religion can be traced back to his student days. In Chapter 3 we already discussed specific aspects of the philosophies of Hegel and Feuerbach which had direct impact upon Marx’s critique of religion.
Having set the stage we shall now proceed with his own critique. In doing so, first we will examine Marx’s critique of religion in general, and then we will discuss his criticism of Christianity in particular.

According to Marx and Engels, all religions reflect the fact that human lives are controlled by external powers over which they have no control.
Engels put it this way:

> All religion... is nothing but the fantastic reflection in > men’s minds of those external forces which control their > daily life, a reflection in which the terrestrial forces > assume the form of supernatural forces.\(^8\)

He, then makes a contrast between primitive religions and contemporary religions. Whereas in the primitive society it was the power of nature which controlled man, in the modern world it is the forces of the social system which exercise this external dominance:

> In the beginnings of history it was the forces of nature > which were first so reflected and which in the course of > further evolution underwent the most manifold and varied > personifications among the various peoples... But it is not > long before, side by side with the forces of nature, social > forces begin to be active -- forces which confront man as > equally alien and at first equally inexplicable, dominating > him with the same apparent natural necessity as the forces > of nature themselves. The fantastic figures, which at first > only reflected the mysterious forces of nature, at this point > acquire social attributes, become representatives of the > forces of history.\(^9\)

It is not only before nature that man is powerless; he is also overwhelmed by society, so that the processes of society appear to man as strange and terrible divinities. Thus the "fetishism of commodities" comes to replace fetishism of nature. Taking Feuerbach’s lead, Marx developed a theory of religious alienation -- that man projects his own perfection into the supernatural and calls the sum of these qualities ‘God’. This process, Marx said, actually alienates man from himself.

But Marx did not stop at the recognition of this alienation. He went beyond Feuerbach in asserting that it is the economic and social forces that drive human beings to create illusions such as God. Herein lies the genius of Marx. Merely recognizing the fact that man is alienated from himself does no good as long as man is not emancipated from the underlying causes of alienation found in the economic order. For "it is not the consciousness of men that determines their beings, but, on the contrary, their social being that determines their consciousness." 10

Marx’s analysis of the human predicament and alienation leads him from the criticism of religion to the criticism of society. Religion cannot be disposed of, nor can the problem which begets religion be solved, without a radical change of the society and the economic system. Feuerbach’s calculation was wrong when he believed that mere criticism of religion could remove religion from the minds of the people.

Marx sees the criticism of religion only as a preliminary step to the criticism of society, and criticism of society goes hand in hand with the revolutionary political action which not only changes society but also destroys the basis of religion.

Feuerbach considered the concept of God to derive from the thought and temperament of the individual. On the other hand, Marx asks what conditions particular individuals to develop religious concepts and continue to believe in them. Whereas Feuerbach understood the consciousness of God as man’s consciousness of himself, Marx investigates the nature of the man who can develop the self-consciousness only in an alienated way. The problem is carried one stage further;

The basis of irreligious criticism is: Man makes religion, religion does not make man. In other words, religion is the self-consciousness and self-feeling of man who has either not yet found himself or has already lost himself again. But man is no abstract being squatting outside the world. Man is the world of man, the state, society. This state, this society, produce religion, a reversed world-consciousness, because they are a reversed world.11
This is the fundamental principle of Marx’s critique of religion. State and society in their specific, imperfect, unjust, inhuman form produce in human beings a reversed or perverted consciousness, corresponding to human being’s perversion, i.e., religious consciousness.

The task therefore changes from traditional criticism of religion to practical criticism of social and political conditions which produce and maintain religious consciousness. Religion is described as the "moral sanction", the "solemn completion", and the "universal ground for consolation and justification" for this world. This means religion is an integral part of this perverted world, and not simply the perverted consciousness belonging to it. It is necessary as the consolation of human beings in this bad world, to make the perverted world tolerable and to justify it. Without religion this world could not carry on, and for this reason it spontaneously springs up again and again out of the inhuman conditions of life. Therefore Marx finds that religion is still the better part in a bad whole. He says:

Religious distress is at the same time the expression of real distress and the protest against real distress. Religion is the sigh of the oppressed creature, the heart of a heartless world, just as it is the spirit of a spiritless situation. It is the opium of the people.

It is a complete distortion if this often-quoted passage is taken as some sort of vulgar atheism or as a rejection of religion per se, or even as an attack upon religion. It is as though one quoted the Psalmist saying "There is no God". He did say that, of course, but if one wishes to convey his thought one should complete the sentence, "The fool says in his heart, there is no God."

Unless we give careful attention to Marx’s description of religion as opium we will miss the point. Religion is described as the expression of this world’s distress, as the "sigh of the oppressed creature". Mention has already been made that this phrase occurs in Feuerbach’s writings: "God is an unutterable sigh, lying in the depths of the heart." However, religion is at the same time also a protest against this distress. But such protest according to Marx remains vain and ineffectual because it diverts attention from this world and focuses hope on the next. Only after the religious phenomenon has been described as a sigh which awakens concern and as a protest which calls forth sympathy, it is criticized as opium, a sedative and narcotic. Its narcotic effect stems from the fact that it teaches an acceptance of earthly unhappiness by holding out a promise of transcendental happiness. This is what Marx means when he says that religion is the "spirit of a spiritless situation". It takes on an increasingly spiritual and ethereal form, the more spiritless the material world becomes, the more it forces the human spirit toward an "other world". "The struggle against religion is therefore mediately the fight against the other world, of which religion is the spiritual aroma." Thus the denial of religion is not an end in itself, but a fighting doctrine; its source is not a theoretical interest for truth, but the practical interest in the changing of this world into a human one.

At any rate religion can make people content in their soul, in their consciousness, but in an imaginary way and not in any complete and real way. The medicine it offers cannot help to cure the disease from which society and man are suffering; it can only help to alleviate the pain. It therefore seems to Marx to be pointless simply to take this pain relieving drug away from man, quite apart from the fact that as long as the disease lasts it would be futile. It is instead a question of curing the disease itself and thus making the opiate superfluous. Marx poignantly says:

The abolition of religion as the illusory happiness of the people is required for their real happiness. The demand to give up the illusions about its condition is the demand to give up a condition which needs illusions. The criticism of religion is therefore in embryo the criticism of the vale of woe, the halo of which is religion. ... The immediate task of philosophy, which is at the service of history, once the saintly form of human self-alienation has been unmasked, is to unmask self-alienation in its unholy forms. Thus the criticism of heaven turns into the criticism of the earth, the criticism of religion into the criticism of right and the criticism of theology into the criticism of politics.

Thus, we find that Marx’s criticism of religion moves on two levels. That is, first, the unmasking of religion which, according to Marx, has been mainly completed by his predecessors, especially by Feuerbach. But as this unmaking of religion reveals that religion is ‘true’, in the sense that it is an invention of human beings to compensate for and to sublimate their real wretchedness, a second kind of criticism has to follow: religion has to be made false, i.e., the secular world has to be changed. Once the secular world is discovered to be the source of religious ideas, it must be "criticized in theory and revolutionized in practice".

Of these two tasks, Marx had seen the second quite clearly as early as 1844: radical human emancipation could only be effected by a class "with radical chains" the industrial proletariat, through whose action all human beings would be liberated at the same time, because it can only free itself as a class by trying to end every form of domination and exploitation. Once these inhuman social conditions are removed, poverty will also disappear and with it religion which was its inevitable expression and ineffectual protest.

The critique of religion contained in the early writings is continued, at least indirectly, in various sections of Capital. The first chapter of Capital contains the famous section on "The Fetishism of Commodities and the Secret Thereof" which deals directly with the problem of religious alienation. In a manufacturing society the conditions of the individual seem to depend on things, on commodities and the laws of their movement in the market. A mysterious power transforms the results of the human labour into ‘commodities’, endows them with ‘value,’ and makes them exchangeable for other commodities of equal value. This is the mystery which Marx tries to elucidate in the passages from Capital that we quoted earlier.

Marx hopes religion will be overcome by a transformation of the method of production which would permit human relationships to be both ‘intelligible’ and ‘reasonable’:

> The religious reflex of the real world can, in any case, only then finally vanish, when the practical relations of everyday life offer to man none but perfectly intelligible and reasonable relations with regard to his fellow-men and to Nature. The life process of society, which is based on the process of material production, does not strip off its mystical veil until it is treated as production by freely associated men, and is consciously regulated by them in accordance with a settled plan.16

Marx is offering here an outline of an ordered society in which the relations of human beings to one another and to nature are both clearly recognizable and rationally acceptable. This ordered society can be attained, according to Marx, only by individuals voluntarily forming themselves into associations to take over production and distribution. Then the religious reflex of the real world will finally vanish. The task therefore is not to fight religion but, more clearly stated here than before, to set up a society in which religious consciousness will die out. Suffering and mystery, to which Feuerbach attributed the existence of religion, are now seen more precisely as the sorrows brought about by enforced, unreasonable, incomprehensible and alien conditions of life (social structure). The accent is shifted from emotional to intellectual suffering, without losing sight of the reality of that suffering.

Engels found that while institutionalized religion generally seeks to defend the status quo, the content of the religious affirmations has its own logic, and may appeal to, and does appeal to, different classes. In other words, the ruling classes may wish to employ religious belief and feeling as forces for the retention of their power; but religion being a mass phenomenon that transcends classes, may serve as the justification for and inspiration of vast popular movements that are revolutionary. Marxism, thus, emphasizes the revolutionary quality of early Christianity and stresses the significant contrast between early and late Christianity. We can illuminate this point from some classical Marxist writings. In an essay, "On the History of Early Christianity," Engels wrote:

The history of early Christianity has notable points of resemblance with the modern working class movement. Like the latter, Christianity was originally a movement of oppressed people: it first appeared as the religion of slaves and emancipated slaves, of poor people deprived of all rights, of peoples subjugated or dispersed by Rome. Both Christianity and the workers’ socialism preach forth coming salvation from bondage and misery; Christianity places this salvation in a life beyond, after death, in heaven; socialism places it in this world, in a transformation of society. Both are persecuted and baited, their adherents are despised and made the objects of exclusive laws, the former as enemies of the human race, the latter as enemies of the state, enemies of religion, the family, social order. And in spite of all persecution, nay, even spurred on by it, they forge victoriously, irresistibly ahead. Three hundred years after its appearance Christianity was the recognized state religion in the Roman World Empire, and in barely sixty years socialism has won itself a position which makes its victory absolutely certain.\textsuperscript{17}

Karl Kautsky, one of the leading figures of the Second International, maintained that Christianity was originally a revolutionary organization. The liberation from poverty which it proclaimed was at first thought of quite realistically. It was to take place in the world and not in heaven. The transference of liberation to heaven only took place later.\textsuperscript{18}

Marx and Engels do not mean that priests are necessarily impostors who cunningly divert the workers’ attention from their grievances by telling them lies about God and a spiritual world. Still less do they mean that men could be ‘cured’ of their religious beliefs by proving them false, as men might possibly be cured of drug addiction by lectures about the injury it does to them. Rather, the central idea is that religion is a social and psychological mechanism that makes the lives of unhappy men bearable to themselves and serves as a justification for the sufferings they undergo. The sufferings themselves are due to social maladjustments, and if these were remedied, religion would lose its raison d’etre and cease to exist. Therefore, Marx did not believe that a direct attack against religion would ever work. Since religion is only the symptom of a more basic discrepancy, the demise of religion cannot be hastened. Any direct struggle against religion appeared to Marx as useless and misplaced: useless, because religion simply cannot be abolished as long as the world is not put straight; misplaced, because the real enemy is the perverted social order of which, as Marx put it, religion is only the spiritual aroma. Any efficient treatment has to be radical, i.e., to reach the very roots of the evil. In the Manuscripts, Marx writes:

\begin{quote}
Atheism... has no longer any meaning, for atheism is a negation of God, and postulates the existence of man through this negation; but socialism as socialism no longer stands in any need of such a mediation. It proceeds from the practically and theoretically sensuous consciousness of man and of nature as the essence. Socialism is man’s positive self- consciousness.\textsuperscript{19}
\end{quote}

Marx believes that a full reappropriation of what human being has lost in alienation cannot be achieved by a mere annulment of God, but only by an annulment of the social structure of private property which produces the need for God. Thus, for Marx to be human is not to be something, but to do something.

Marxism, manifesting a profound humanism as the heart of its inspiration, naturally opposes religious persecution. It opposes coercive methods aimed at religion. The few references to religion made by Marx in his later years indicate that, in spite of his lack of interest in this kind of problem, his view on religion and atheism did not change as the years passed. Thus, for instance, in his "Critique of the Gotha Programme" (1875), Marx argues: "Everyone should be able to attend to his religious as well as his bodily needs without the police sticking their noses in."\(^{20}\)

Before we proceed with Marx’s critique of Christianity in particular, let us examine briefly how Lenin’s critique of religion differs from that of Marx. It is important to note this distinction, because the religious persecutions which took place in Russia under the dictatorship of Lenin are contrary to the spirit of Marx, as is evident from the last statement of the preceding paragraph. The key to understand Lenin’s attitude toward religion is his materialism.

Lenin was not satisfied with the materialism of Marx, but expanded his theory by adding a materialistic world view. Marx’s critique of religion was replaced by the eighteenth century popular critique of religion, clergy, and church, evidently because it was more effective as a political weapon. Lenin himself admits that Marx’s critique of religion did not have the same propagandistic effect as that of the eighteenth century Enlightenment:

A Marxist could not make a worse mistake than to think that the many millions of people (particularly peasants and artisans) who are condemned by modern society to ignorance, illiteracy and prejudices can extricate themselves from this ignorance only by following the straight line of purely Marxist education.\(^{21}\)

For this reason, Lenin urges the distribution of "militant atheist literature" from the eighteenth century. His emphasis of a materialistic world view, may therefore be explained on the basis of the political need for effective weapons against contemporary, conservative churches.

He called for attacks on religion. Those who believe in God are regarded as ignorant and backward people in need of instruction. Instead of meeting Christians with tolerance and respect, they are met with persecution in the form of enlightenment. Lenin said:

Our programme is based entirely on scientific -- to be more precise -- upon a materialist world conception. In explaining our programme, therefore we must necessarily explain the actual historical and economic roots of the religious fog. Our programme necessarily includes the propaganda of atheism. The publication of related scientific literature (which up till now has been strictly forbidden and persecuted by the autocratic feudal government) must now form one of the items of our party work. 22

Marx’s sociological critique of religion also influenced Lenin. He, like Marx, opposed the attempts of Bakunin and his anarchist disciples to put the struggle against religion in the centre of the class struggle. The question of religion must not be the principal issue that separates the religious and non-religious workers into two camps and weakens the class struggle. Instead the struggle must be focused on "the social roots of religion," i.e., capitalism. 23

When Lenin combined Marx’s sociological critique of religion with anti-religious belief in science, the result was a drastic intensification of the critique of religion. Religion as an unscientific world view is entirely negative. According to Lenin, the idea of God is simply a weapon in the hands of the oppressors:

The idea of god has always lulled and blunted "social emotions," and substituted concern for the dead for interest in the living. It has always involved the idea of slavery (of the worst and most hopeless slavery). The idea of god has never "united the individual with society." It has always bound the oppressed classes by faith in the divinity to submission to their oppressors. 24

The tendency toward intolerance became stronger because of Lenin’s theory about the Communist Party as an elite, especially as his successors interpreted it. The function of the party was to indoctrinate a revolutionary consciousness into the proletariat. It is the perils of this intolerance and aggression inherent in such a cleavage between the enlightened party and the unenlightened masses that we find in the subsequent developments in Russia.

In this respect, Mao Zedong is closer to Marx than Lenin is. Mao rejects Lenin’s insistence on a struggle against religion, and accepts the idea that religion will disappear once it is deprived of its social basis. Mao said: "It is the peasants who made the idols, and when the time comes they will cast the idols aside with their own hands: there is no need for any one else to do it for them prematurely."\(^{25}\)

This does not mean that Mao excludes the possibility of a conflict between the party and religion, because the socialist revolution is something which involves the life of the entire society. The significant point here is that this conflict is social and political.

On the whole, Mao’s critique of religion is essentially sociological and political, as is indicated in his statement: "If religion doesn’t interfere with the People’s Republic, the People’s Republic will not interfere with it."\(^{26}\)

We shall now turn our attention to Marx’s critique of Christianity in particular. Marx’s main target was not God but religion, and chiefly Christianity which he felt was an obstacle to man’s self-realization. In other words, in Marxism, propaganda against the church did not develop out of a denial of God and his work, or from a denial of the Gospel and its spiritual power. As a matter of fact, Engels declares of the early Christian writings: "they could just as well have been written by one of the prophetically minded enthusiasts of the International."\(^{27}\) It grew rather from an opposition to the church as a definite socio-political form which in the name of so-called religion defended the old social order with all its injustices, its cultural backwardness, and its conservative immobility.

Mention has already been made that Marx and Engels were critically aware of the significant contrast between early and late Christianity. Here let us examine more specifically how Marx found Christianity justifying the existing order. Marx’s criticism is that the church taught the masses that the established order is willed by God and that, as obedient and submissive subjects, they should resign themselves to it. The doctrine of original sin has been used for this purpose. St. Augustine wrote in his City of God that God introduced slavery into the world as a punishment for original sin. To seek, therefore, to abolish slavery would be to rebel against the will of God. The German church of Marx’s time literally followed this statement. They taught that ‘order’ was given by God, and therefore any attempt to interfere with it was a sin against God. Religion seemed to be a part of the ‘superstructure’ which sanctioned the existing order, promised rewards in heaven for enduring the pain on earth, and therefore suppressed any attempt to change the real social condition of this world. So Marx saw a parallel between the way the British and French used guns to force opium on the Chinese people in the mid-nineteenth century and the way the Christian church used religion to deaden the social awareness of the working people. Hence the critique that Christianity’s function is something by which the proletariat is rendered incapable of protesting against its own exploitation.
Encounter in Humanization: Insights for Christian-Marxist Dialogue and Cooperation

Marx and Engels point out that Christianity is grounded not in a political, but in an eschatological vision -- the second coming of Christ and the establishment of the Kingdom of God. Jesus and his disciples expected that this eschatological vision will be realized within their lifetime. Accordingly, the function of the teaching of Jesus was to prepare people for the second coming, and not to root them in an existence whose nature is basically corrupted. Since the second coming did not materialize in their time, Marx contends, early Christians began to abandon the teaching of Jesus.

When the much expected Kingdom of God did not realize, Christianity began to accept its given lot with the conviction that one is to render to Caesar what is his own and to submit to authority since it was "ordained by God". But as a result of its willingness to comply with any secular authority which would protect its own religious practice, Christianity ended by accommodating itself through history to everything wicked and degrading in the social existence of human beings. Marx says:

The social principles of Christianity justified the slavery of Antiquity, glorified the serfdom of the Middle Ages and equally know, when necessary, how to defend the oppression of the proletariat, although they make a pitiful face over it. The social principles of Christianity preach the necessity of a ruling and an oppressed class, and all they have for the latter is the pious wish the former will be charitable. The social principles of Christianity transfer the consistorial councillor’s adjustment of all infamies to heaven and thus justify the further existence of those infamies on earth. The social principles of Christianity declare all vile acts of the oppressors against the oppressed to be either the just punishment of original sin and other sins or trials that the Lord in his infinite wisdom imposes on those redeemed.28

Marx and Engels never get tired of noting the baseness of organized religion and the extent of its hypocrisy. They maintain that except for its early days Christianity has always been on the side of the oppressor. Marx rarely misses the opportunity to vent his sarcasm at the self-seeking of the religious institutions as when he notes in Capital that "the English Established Church... will more readily pardon an attack on 38 of its 39 articles than on 1/39 of its income."29

In 1855 during an anti-church demonstration in London, Marx criticized the established church for its callousness and reactionary policy, and said: "The classical saint of Christianity mortified his body for the salvation of the souls of the masses; the modern, educated saint mortifies the bodies of the masses for the salvation of his own soul."30

Christianity, throughout its history and especially in the Middle Ages, appears to be an institution bearing the heavy imprint of class power and prestige. Since the time Constantine proclaimed Christianity as the official religion of the State, the church grew as "the most general synthesis and sanction of the existing feudal domination."31 Clergy obtained a monopoly on learning, which became essentially theological. Even politics and jurisprudence had the influence of theology. Eventually the church passed from a persecuted minority to a powerful oppressor. Christianity "had partaken of the fruits of slavery in the Roman Empire for centuries, and later did nothing to prevent the slave trade of Christians".32 It required of the small farmer to transfer the title to his land and his independence to its growing power. Thus Christianity hoped to reduce the free farmer to a serf. In these circumstances, "all the generally voiced attacks against feudalism were above all attacks against the Church, and all social and political, revolutionary doctrines were necessarily at the same time mainly theological heresies."33 Since the church stood as the ideological sanction of the feudal system, it was necessary to de-mythologize that system before it could be directly destroyed. It was in the context of this need that the Protestant Reformation occurred.
Marx and Engels maintain that the religious revolution which goes by the name of Protestant Reformation was actually a reflection of underlying economic forces. It is to be noted here that for a Marxist the reformation has no ultimate foundation in religiosity for the simple reason that for him religion is a part of the social superstructure and is therefore primarily an effect, rather than a cause, of social action. What is progressive in religion does not, for Marx, derive from some inherent virtue in the religious mode of consciousness, but rather from the fact that the economic forces which are the ultimate causes of the religious mentality, are entering a progressive stage. There often have been in history humane religious movements directed at the reform of established religious institutions, but they do not derive necessarily from any logic inherent in the spirit of religion itself, but from more social causes.

Marx notes that the "forcible expropriation" of property in the sixteenth century received "a new and frightful impulse from the Reformation, and from the consequent colossal spoliation of the church property."34 The inhabitants of the monasteries were hurled into the proletariat and subtenants of the church’s estates had their land confiscated as they were themselves forcibly removed. Again, Protestantism supported the genesis of capital by "changing almost all the traditional holidays into workdays". In these and numerous other ways, Protestantism was merely carrying out the underlying thrust of the growing tendency of capitalism itself. To Marx and Engels Protestantism was the perfect religious expression of capitalism.

When accused of trying to abolish Christianity and to establish atheism, the attitude of Marx and Engels is that such charges do not deserve serious attention at all. They remind us what happened in the history:

When the ancient world was in the last throes, the ancient religions were overcome by Christianity. When Christian ideas succumbed in the 18th century to rationalist ideas, feudal society fought its death battle with the then revolutionary bourgeoisie.35

Marx and Engels believe that religion will be replaced by the proletariat in a similar way. In a review of G. Fr. Daumer’s, The Religion of the New Age, Marx and Engels elucidate this point further. They contend that all conceptions and ideas are transformed with each great transformation of social circumstances. Different social circumstances generate different religions. In their time, people have at last discovered the secret of this historical process and were no longer willing to deify this process in the exuberant form of a new religion. They simply strip off all religions. Once man has found his way back to himself in the ‘material’ order, he has no need to delude himself. Religion as an expression of his distress will disappear exactly as morbid delusion vanish with the body’s restoration to health. Insofar as it is a protest against this distress, the sigh of the oppressed creature, it will become superfluous. The illusory happiness which the religious opiate offers will be replaced by "real happiness".

Marx’s criticism of Christianity can be summed up in the declaration that Christianity is the transcendent justification of social injustice. He condemns the Christian substitution of charity for justice. Marx emphasizes this criticism once more by referring to the "Jewish Question". In the eighteen centuries of Christian domination, he says, whatever has been granted to the Jews has been given grudgingly and by way of concession, never as a recognition of their rights as human beings. The real Christian task should not be that of just helping the poor with charity; rather it is to ensure for the poor the exercise of those rights whereby they can cease to be poor.

From our discussion so far, one thing is obvious: Whenever Marx attacks religion, or particularly the church, it is an indirect attack on the evils of society. Similarly, attacks on the evils of society are indirectly attacks on religion. He challenged the religion of his time to build a just social order. Thus we can say that Marx was, by his sense of injustice found in the society, on the side of the angels. Hence he has been classified with the "Children of Light" and not with the "Children of Darkness."36

At this point one might as well ask the question why Marx’s criticism was particularly aimed at Christianity among all the religions. The answer is quite obvious. Christianity was the dominant religion in the society which Marx knew. Also, along with Hegel, he considered Christianity as the absolute religion which synthesized in itself all the religious tendencies which the history of man had manifested. That is why Leslie Dewart says that Marxist atheism is truly anti-theism, and specifically and historically anti-Christian anti-theism.37

To sum up Marx’s critique of religion: Marx believed that as long as the human being remains under the control of alien forces, let it be the power of nature or the various forces of society, religion will persist. As long as the human being is incapable of eradicating social evils, the need for "illusory compensation" will continue to exist. What is needed is that human beings must redeem themselves from the bondage of external forces. The only redemption open to them is that which will be gained through their own labour. When one is redeemed by one’s own potentialities, one will realize that the ideals which are rooted in one’s nature need no longer be projected beyond society and history into an unearthly realm. Human beings will recognize that it is the power within themselves that establishes the conditions of their own dignity and destiny. To hold that the evil of this world will be redeemed by an agency beyond the human person and time is to destroy the motive for secular transformation. If the secular transformation is to be achieved, people must destroy the foundation upon which religious illusion flourishes. Thus in the course of building a society "in which the free development of each is the condition for the development of all," one must fight religion because it will inevitably stand in one’s path. And yet, in the new transformed society there will be no need to persecute religion, for its essential function will have disappeared. There will no longer be an exploiting class, nor will the common people stand in need of religious consolation. Religion itself will disappear of its own accord without persecution. This contention is at the heart of everything that Marx wrote, and is not, as has been maintained by some, a youthful enthusiasm of Marx which he abandoned on attaining maturity. The autonomy of the human person -- that was the goal Marx wanted to achieve through his critique of religion. Marx’s criticism of religion ends

With the teaching that man is the highest essence for man, hence with the categoric imperative to overthrow all relations in which man is a debased, enslaved, abandoned, despicable essence.38

Notes:

1. MEGA Ii (2) p. 186.

5. MEGALI, See also, Aeschylus, op.cit., p. 302, 303.

7. On religion, op. cit., p. 46

12. Ibid

13. Ibid. p.42

Chapter 5: Transcendence According to Marx

From our discussion so far one thing is clear: the crucial point and the very essence of Marx’s critique of religion is not its denial of God, but the affirmation and acknowledgment of human autonomy. The basis of religious belief that human beings are God’s creatures are countered by the thesis that they are their own makers. This is the source of the Marxist picture of history and of human being, with all its political and moral consequences. This critique of religion, and the element of atheism implied in it, is therefore an integral part of Marxist conception of the world.

Marx criticizes that the idea of God, the Creator God, bars the human person’s endless future and impoverishes the person’s perspectives, endeavours, and struggles. He emphasizes that human creativity cannot reach its potential in God, that is, outside the human. He does not accept the Christian conception of human being which begins and ends with God, the source of all human actuality and potentiality. Viewed in this way, for Marx, God is the end of the possibilities which are the breath of our being. Thus, we can say that Marx’s critique of religion is not primarily and essentially a revolt against God, but rather a struggle on behalf of the human beings in all of their personal needs and social relations. As it was pointed out by Olof Klohr of Jena, "The atheism of Marxism is, in essence, not the ‘No’ to religion and God, but the ‘Yes’ to the world, the ‘Yes’ to the conscious formation of human life."\(^1\) Marx is not out to get rid of God; he is to free human beings -- not to free from God but from themselves and from their enslavement to religion, which is their own creation. It is not God but the belief in God which must go, if human beings are to be free.

Thus at least theoretically Marx does not see the destruction of religion as an important aim. The disappearance of religion will be the normal outcome of a rational thinking and rational living. Man’s ultimate task, as Marx sees it, is self-creation which man accomplishes by creating a world. The world which the human being thus creates is so rich that there is no room left in it for belief in anything but human. It is a world in which authentic humanity is guaranteed and gradually achieved in the material, moral, cultural and intellectual spheres. The primary aim of Marx’s critique of religion and his atheistic position is the realization of the positive factor of transcendence.

According to Marx, transcendence means not only abolishing the dehumanizing conditions of human life but also preserving the true essence of the human person and shaping the person’s own destiny by going beyond the given. This, of course, fits with the literal meaning of the word ‘transcend’ -- to rise above’ or ‘to go beyond the limits.

Marxist philosopher Jaroslav Krejci defines transcendence as "consisting essentially in endeavours and activities aimed at going beyond the given reality, the world as it is, overcoming it practically, conceptually and ideologically."\(^2\) It is in this sense Marx employs the term transcendence, because transcendence perpetually opens the way for the future. However, he does not regard this opening of a new future as an incursion of the divine into human history, as in religion. Marx conceives transcendence as dynamic human reality, as a self-transcending formation of the meaning and values of our life, as an active, real, and not merely theoretical, crossing of the frontiers of human power, freedom, culture and perspectives. By transcendence Marx means the movement of the living and humanly experienced present into the future. This transcendence which is the human person’s openness to what is to come, unlimited openness, is in Marxism a human project in a definite historical situation, a human choice to remain open to the future as limitless human dimension, an absence of any final boundary. This choice and project form the content of the present fight for the future, including the political struggle. The concept of transcendence has so far not been sufficiently elaborated theoretically in Marxist philosophy. The primary reason for this lack of interest is that Marx himself did not systematically develop the concept of transcendence per se, though it was fundamental to his thought and lifework. Secondly, many Marxists have often been reluctant to use the term, for the term transcendence poses certain problems. Traditionally the notion of transcendence is related to belief in a world beyond, and it has some irrational and supernatural connotations. In religion, for example, according to Marxists, transcendence denotes the illusion of an absolute and static plenitude of moral ideals, justice, freedom, love, etc. But for Marxists, transcendence is the actual human experience that the human person, though belonging to nature, is different from the things and animals and that the human being, able to progress always, is never complete.

This claim to transcendence is crucial to the understanding of Marx’s critique of religion. Since Marx himself has not developed it, we shall examine this important concept by using an indirect method by means of the study of Marx’s humanism. By humanism Marx means the doctrine that affirms the value and dignity of the human being. It takes on a more precise meaning in as much as it affirms that man is an end in himself, and that he consequently rejects any form of servitude that would reduce him to a means at the hands of an owner. The decisive productive force of history is the human person at work in all the spheres of creative activity: in production, discovery, invention, artistic creation, political and moral decisions. This is why Marx says that the driving force of history is within history itself. History is not made from outside, neither by a destiny such as Greek thought posited, nor by a providence extrinsic to human activity, nor by Hegel’s "Absolute Spirit". Marx valued more highly than anything else the initiative of human beings in history. In "The Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Bonaparte" Marx stresses this point: "Men make their own history". Man is always something other and something more than the sum of the conditions which have produced him. This is what distinguishes him from other kinds of animals. Otherwise we should be relegated to an existence determined solely by instinct. Echoing the Italian philosopher Vico, Marx pointed out that man was not responsible for evolution of nature but for his own history.

Marx also believed that the advent of real man is the goal of history, which can be attained only by revolutionary action. But, what is this "real man"? First of all, he is a man related to nature. Nature is man’s proper context. Nature and man interact; nature produces man but man produces nature by his labour. As Marx phrased it, "History itself is a real part of natural history -- of nature developing into man." Human history is the story of man’s humanizing nature, or, to put it in another way, in man nature becomes human. If man is abstracted from his context, both he and his context are destroyed.

Secondly, human being is a socially active natural being, and not just natural being as such. The history of human being in nature is properly realized only in the case of social human being. Here is where nature and human being are united by society. As Marx put it, "My own existence is social activity, and therefore that which I make of myself, I make of myself for society and with the consciousness of myself as a social being." It is the concrete web of relations which is actualized in human social existence.

Thirdly, human self-consciousness (in social activity) is seen as the theoretical form of that being whose living form is the community. The spiritual faculties and intellectual operations of human beings are simply the theoretical expressions of their real being. Any abstraction from this reality -- human being as a homeless spirit, as animal, as a kind of god, etc. -- does not refer to real human being at all. Marx does not deny that human beings are, of course, individuals. They do think individual thoughts. Human beings are born and they die as individuals. But the use of the term human as opposed, say, to animal, is to man as he is "the subjective existence of thought and experienced society for itself". Man is what he is concretely: in society and in nature. This is his uniqueness and dignity.

This portrait of man is the basis of Marx’s humanism. Any form of social structure that negates this man must itself be negated. Since man was, and is, the maker of himself, since he alone makes history, he bears full responsibility for what becomes of him and history. Marx contends that the liberty of man is not yet an accomplished fact. Man is deprived of liberty, enslaved and made an instrument. In other words, man is alienated. Alienation is defined with reference to the ideal, complete man, as he ought to be, man as free. Man is alienated means, more precisely the following: (a) He is not what he ought to be (privation), (b) There is lacking in him something of his very self (mutilation), (c) He is estranged from himself and from reality (estrangement), (d) He identifies himself psychologically with an imaginary existence which becomes a substitute for reality (identification), (e) He is torn by a conflict between his real essence and his ideal essence (contradiction), (f) He is reduced to a means, to slavery (enslavement).\textsuperscript{7} The process of overcoming alienation is the process through which man becomes what he ought to be, attains his ideal essence, seeks and again finds himself, repossesses that part of himself which had been seized from him, resolves the contradiction within him and reaches liberty. It is this unceasing process which Marx calls ‘transcendence’.

In \textit{The Holy Family} Marx wrote that the proletariat cannot free itself without abolishing the conditions of its own life. It cannot abolish the conditions of its own life without abolishing \textit{all} the inhuman conditions of life of society today which are summed up in its own situation.\textsuperscript{8}

Abolishing all the inhuman conditions of life in society, and thus humanizing the relation to the material world and nature, the human person will transcend all forms of alienation. Religion and state are only partial expressions of the one fundamental alienation of the human being from nature and are bound to disappear simultaneously with their cause. But a religious or political emancipation alone can never liberate human beings. The religious critique merely fights the consciousness of alienation and leaves the roots of alienation intact. The mistake lies in the assumption that ideas are independent of the social conditions of action and, consequently, that they can be changed without changing the conditions which produced them. This is what Marx means when he criticizes the atheism of his time: "Communism begins from the outset... with atheism, but atheism is at first far from being communism; indeed, it is still mostly an abstraction."\textsuperscript{9} The same holds true for the political critique. Not political reforms but only a reintegration of man with nature can return him to his true essence. The key factor to the reintegration of man with nature is labour. Labour is the factor which mediates between man and nature; labour is man’s efforts to regulate his metabolism with nature. Labour is the expression of human life and through labour human relationship to nature is changed, hence through labour human beings change themselves.

The re-integration of human being with nature will also restore the bond between the human being and fellow human beings, for the humanization of nature is essentially a social task. "Activity and mind, both in their content and in their \textit{mode of existence}, are social: social activity and social mind."10

The adjective ‘social’ refers not just to work done in immediate cooperation with others. Even the lonely task of the scientist is social, for the material on which he works as well as his personal life are products of the community. His consciousness is "the theoretical shape of that which the living shape is the real community"11 There is a mutual causality between the human person and society. The society which the human being creates through work will in turn create the human being. "Just as society itself produces man as man, so is society produced by him."12 "Thus society is the unity of being of man with nature -- the true resurrection of nature."13

According to Marx, communism strives for such a society, and hence he describes communism as "the positive transcendence of private property,... the real appropriation of the human essence by and for man;..."14 Most communist theories suppress private property by making it into common property. But such a solution still maintains the basic principle of private property: it considers material possession and not man’s self-realization as the aim of labour. Marx criticized this kind of crude communism in these words:

In negating the personality of man in every sphere, this type of communism is really nothing but the logical expression of private property, which is its negation. General envy constituting itself as a power is the disguise in which greed re-establishes itself and satisfies itself, only in another way. The thought of every piece of private property -- inherent in each piece as such -- is at least turned against all wealthier private property in the form of envy and the urge to reduce things to a common level, so that this envy and urge even constitute the essence of competition. The crude communism is only the culmination of this envy and of this leveling down proceeding from the preconceived minimum. It has a definite, limited standard. How little this annulment of private property is really an appropriation is in fact proved by the abstract negation of the entire world of culture and civilization, the regression to the unnatural simplicity of the poor and undemanding man who has not only failed to go beyond private property, but has not yet even reached it.15
Private property should be suppressed not by making it common property, but by abolishing the alienation itself of which it is the expression. Through this positive transcendence of private property, the object of man’s activity again becomes a human object. Man appropriates the world in a human way: his relation to it is no longer a means to an end outside himself but an expression of his entire being, in which he objectifies himself without losing himself. Nature becomes human and man becomes natural.

Man’s objectification of himself in nature creates a genuine culture when he uses nature in a truly human way. When man’s relationship with nature is truly humanized by the transcendence of private property, Marx believed, all expressions of estranged human life will disappear.

In religion, the content of transcendence is God, the transcendent future is the power of God which comes to humanity and evokes a response. But Marx denies any sort of superhuman transcendence. He is reluctant to identify transcendence with God because he understands the absoluteness of God to function as a limit, a restraint upon the otherwise unlimited field of human possibilities. Dependence on a transcendent God and full human autonomy are incompatible:

A being only considers himself independent when he stands on his own feet; and he only stands on his own feet when he owes his existence to himself. A man who lives by the grace of another regards himself as a dependent being. But I live completely by the grace of another if I owe him not only the maintenance of my life, but if he has, moreover, created my life -- if he is the source of my life. When it is not of my own creation, my life has necessarily a source of this kind outside of it.16

Echoing Aristotle, Marx says:

You have been begotten by your father and your mother; therefore in you the mating of two human beings -- a species-act of human being -- has produced the human being. You see, therefore, that even physically, man owes his existence to man.17
Thus the question of creation cannot even arise for Marx, because it conflicts with praxis.

We shall elucidate Marx’s concept of transcendence with reference to one of the leading Marxist thinkers of our time. Roger Garaudy, who is well known for his sympathetic attitude towards religion, has pointed out that religion may have some practical justification:

> Like every ideology, religion is a project, it is a way of breaking away from, transcending the given, of anticipating the real, whether by justifying the existing order or by protesting against it and attempting to transform it.\(^{18}\)

But this does not change Garaudy’s position on religion as a whole, for this transcendence must always remain within the immanence of human possibilities. According to him, "transcendence is no longer an attribute of God but a dimension of man, a dimension of our experience and our acts."\(^{19}\) It is a totally human phenomenon, a "dialectical supersession" of man by himself.\(^{20}\)

Thus the difference between religious (to be more precise, Christian) and Marxist concepts of transcendence is this:

> For a Christian, transcendence is the act of God who comes towards him and summons him. For a Marxist, it is a dimension of man’s activity which goes out beyond itself towards its far-off being.\(^{21}\)

Garaudy asserts that any attempt to refer transcendence to an absolute, to God, would be to limit man by imposing an antiquated worldview on him. To the Marxist, transcendence is actually a demand, an exigency, a driving force, but a force that cannot be conceived, named, or expected. As Garaudy put it:

> To investigate the dimension of transcendence, conceived not as an attribute to God but as a dimension of man, is not to start from something which exists in our world in a vain attempt to prove the existence of what can exist only in another world; it is simply to investigate all the dimensions of human reality.\(^{22}\)
The human being is an incomplete being, a creature in the process of formation. The goal of this self-creation is an ever fuller social consciousness, a more complete social integration, and an absolute domination of the physical world. In other words, the exigency of which Garaudy speaks is future oriented -- it is the demand for an ever more complete realization of the potential of human persons.

Here, then, is the sum and substance of Marx’s concept of transcendence: The moment, nature gave birth to man by a "spontaneous generation", it became essentially related to him, to be humanized by his free activity. Nature and man are no longer two powers in opposition to one another, but two terms of one relation. Through a vital interplay with nature man makes himself. Unlike other animals which are passively determined by their material environment he actively transforms nature and adopts it to his own needs. Thus man rises over all other animal species and begins an historical evolution. Here we have a qualitative leap, a real outgrowing, a transcendence in the strictly etymological sense of the term. The future to which he is moving is completely open to man. He shapes the universe and his own destiny, and thus he is not any more the object of history but its subject and agent. It is this possibility, which enables man to move towards the future along an original road that the animal was incapable of knowing -- the road that entails freedom and choice -- what Marx calls Aufhebung, which we might translate ‘transcendence’ in the strictly etymological sense of the term.

Notes

4. Ibid., p. 372 note.

14. Ibid., p. 135. By "private property Marx does not mean the private property of things for use such as furniture, automobile, etc., but the property of the "propertied class" (capitalists). Since they own the means of production, they hire the property-less individual to work for them, under conditions the latter is forced to accept. Thus the property-less individual is reduced to a means of production. Hence "private property" is considered here as an expression of human self-alienation.

21. Garaudy Anathema to Dialogue, p.92

Bishop Paulose Mar Paulsoe prefers to call himself a "secular theologian" because he communicates the Christian faith in secular language. He received his Ph.D. from Princeton Theological Seminary for a dissertation on Bonhoeffer's corrective of Karl Marx. He was a Bishop in the Chaldean Syrian Church in Kerala, India and served as President of the World Student Christian Federation. Published by Christava Sahitya Samithy (CSS), Tiruvalla-689 101, Kerala, S. India. This material was prepared for Religion Online by Ted and Winnie Brock.

Chapter 6: Marx’s Critique of Religion as Challenge to Christianity

Perhaps there is no other aspect of Marxist ideology which has drawn the attention of Christians as much as atheism. Christians are disturbed and feel threatened when they meet atheists. But let us not forget that when we confront atheism, we are actually inquiring about the destiny of our generation as a whole. For this reason it must be clear from the very beginning that in no way does this confrontation of atheism express only a specific Christian concern. Whether Christians bother about it or not, the theme of atheism concerns all equally. As long as Christians seek to present a strong and vital testimony of their faith, they must know that the world of which they are a part is influenced by an atheistic climate.

It is highly important that Christians must guard themselves against merely defaming atheism with a blunt, propagandistic attitude. Many see in atheism only an error, the most dangerous error in history; they find its roots in moral deviation, and their prime concern is to proclaim its condemnation. This is indeed not an encouraging encounter with atheism. If we are to understand atheism in its right perspective we have to quit the approach of condemnation. Giulio Girardi brings out this point succinctly:
Since man is fundamentally orientated towards truth and authentic values, it is to be expected that, for the atheist himself, the meaning of atheism consists more in the truths which it involves than in the errors in which it finds expression; more in the real values which it affirms than in those it denies. To understand atheism means, therefore, to ask what are the truths which the atheist intends to adhere when he denies God.¹

This does not mean, however, that atheism can be reduced to the rejection of a deformed image of God and of religion, as done by some Christians. They reach a paradoxical conclusion that the atheistic denial is directed at a falsely conceived God, and therefore atheism is not in fact error, but truth. This approach is as distorted as that of condemnation. What is needed on the part of the believer is an acute and balanced power of discrimination, equidistant from either a condemnation or an acceptance. Atheism may not be reduced either to its errors or to its truths. It results from both.

Those not well acquainted with Marx often believe that the founder of Marxism was a militant atheist who considered the extermination of religion and, in particular, of Christianity one of his major tasks. This is not true. Marx, of course, was an atheist. It is to be noted here, however, that his atheism is quite different from the classical atheism of eighteenth and nineteenth centuries which are ‘political’ and ‘scientist’ in nature. Marx’s atheism was neither a purely methodological one, nor merely a skeptical one. Nor does it seem correct to say that his atheism was an historical accident rather than an essential feature of the Marxian worldview. Marx’s atheism is distinctly dogmatic, in the sense that Marx always denied decidedly and uncompromisingly the existence of a divine being, and this denial is one of the major cornerstones of Marx’s outlook. Marx, however, was far from ascribing to the anti-religious fight the importance which it has, for example, in the eyes of many contemporary communists. He looked on religion as a consequence of a more basic evil, the evil of a society in which man "has either not yet found himself or has already lost himself again." As Marx saw it, religion in general and Christianity in particular were in extremis, if not already dead.

Marx’s atheism is essentially humanistic. It starts not from a negation, but from an affirmation. It affirms the autonomy of the human being and it involves as a consequence the rejection of every attempt to rob of human person creative power. It concentrates our feelings, our thoughts and our actions around humanity. This aspect of humanism found in Marx’s atheism can be elucidated in these words of Erich Fromm:

The problem today is not so much whether God is dead, the problem is whether man is dead. Man, not physically at this moment -- although that is threatened too -- but spiritually. Whether man has not become and is becoming more an automation, which will eventually leave him completely empty and without vitality. The new humanism in its various forms is united in its determination that man should not die.²

The vacuum created by the elimination of God in classical atheism has now been filled by humanity. Humanity has been substituted for God.

Marx’s atheism is not pessimistic in nature. It tends on the contrary to be optimistic. This is because it is motivated largely by man’s self-assertion. The modern secular man is an autonomous man. He believes that there is no higher Being than man himself, so man must create his own values, set his own standards and goals, and work out his own salvation. There is nothing transcending man’s own powers and intelligence, so he cannot look for any support from beyond himself. He suspects that faith in God would be awakening of his own sense of responsibility and finds that God begins to appear as his rival. Too long have men been subject to God or to gods, and only as they have learned to take matters into their own hands have they made any advance. So we are told that man cannot really be free to order their world and to build a better future unless God is deposed and men assume complete responsibility. Man has gotten rid of God in order to regain possession of the human greatness which, as it seems to him, is being unjustifiably withheld by another. By discarding God he has overthrown an obstacle in order to gain his freedom. Proudhon, the Robinson Crusoe of Socialism, calls this position "anti-theism". It is this anti-theism that we find in Marxism. We can summarize Marx’s atheism, which is anti-theism in content, in these words of Milan Machovec:

What is the deepest meaning of atheistic Marxism? Certainly not the mere negation of the idea of ‘God’, for no mere negation can fill men with deep and enduring enthusiasm. Nor the mere abolition of hunger, need, exploitation. Those were and unfortunately still are the primary concrete tasks in some countries. But they will be solved one day, and what then? The ultimate meaning of Marxism is not politics or the cult of power, for that too has to be abolished. Nor did Marx want to turn all men into economists, quite the opposite. By the predominantly economic character of his greatest works Marx aimed at freeing men from economic cares. The enduring positive ideal and meaning of Marxist teaching is the fully authentic human life, the free human personality, or rather the ‘message’ that we must seek real ways of attaining the humanist ideals by scientific analysis and patiently overcome any, not just the capitalistic, forms of human self-alienation.\(^3\)

If we were to judge Marx’s atheism solely on the basis of Marxist propaganda, the picture would be just as poor as would be a judgement on religious consciousness based on attendance figures at religious services. Marx’s atheism is striving for a revolutionary worldview, which is not dependent on its formal rejection of religion. Marx is trying to restore to people a purpose in life and to give the whole struggle of mankind a higher meaning. We cannot completely ignore this effort, to the extent that it is directed at the progress of humanity. This reminds us that the church must be ready to witness to the lordship of Christ by cooperating with people of goodwill of all religious and non-religious groups who are genuinely concerned to seek better ways of living and working.

From the church’s point of view, atheism has always been regarded as a negative phenomenon. Anyone who did not believe in a particular religious faith was called an atheist. This was the general view in the medieval and modern ages of intolerance when freedom of opinion did not exist. At the time of Enlightenment Thomas Paine defended himself against this kind of logic: "If I do not believe as you believe, that only proves that you do not believe as I believe, that is all."\(^4\) Atheism does not primarily mean to believe in nothing at all, but to believe in a way which is not that of religion. Modern Marxists can say the same thing in defense of their own form of belief. To recognize that fact in a sober and critical way and to discuss the matters at issue belong also to church’s encounter with atheists. But it is a pity that the appropriate critical relation toward atheism has been uncritically expanded into a kind of negativism. It has been the practice of the church to summarize atheism as something inhuman, absolutely perverted and even almost demonic. So for centuries the atheist has been regarded as someone basically irresponsible and untrustworthy, even immoral. Atheism itself has consequently been viewed in a juridical way as a sacrilege, a transgression, something which should be resisted with utmost retaliation. As a Christian community we have to recognize and acknowledge the relativity of atheism.

The Greeks designated as atheists not only those who denied openly God and the materialists but also those who in the name of another faith separated themselves from the established religion. Socrates is an example to this. Many a Christian martyr encountered the battle cry. "Down with the atheists". Even in Christianity itself we find the tendency to call those who differ from orthodox faith as atheists. "It is worthwhile" as Lochman suggests, "to remember this lesson of our historical orientation and resist that inquisition and crusade spirit precisely when we meet those who think differently from us, especially in our encounters with atheists."

Atheism is a dialectical phase of life. "I believe; help my unbelief!" This situation is significant. Doubt is an integral part of living faith. If we rightly understand this psychological relativity, we will not be so easily tempted to consider the atheistic possibility as something totally alien to us, as a curse which only drives and threatens other people. In one of his novels, The Possessed, Dostoyevsky makes Bishop Tihon say to Stavrogin: "The complete atheist stands on the penultimate step to most perfect faith (he may or may not take a further step)." This has been made one of the most profound statements that has ever been on the subject of atheism. All people, the pious and the worldly, here find themselves together in the same situation.

The theological relativity of atheism directs us to the foundations of the life of faith. The beginning and ground of human existence does not lie within us, but lies instead in the reality which is the basis for faith -- in the reality, action, and history of God. The essence of Christianity is founded not by faith but by the work of God more exactly, in the life, death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. Thus this essence of faith cannot in any way be destroyed by unfaith. Both faith and unfaith are not the matter itself, but instead they are response to it. The Gospel remains sovereign over faith and unfaith. Therefore the task of the church is not to denounce the atheists but to declare the Gospel to them.
The spiritual situation of the world, especially in those societies hitherto nominally Christian, shows that not just the Marxists, but all modern people are conditioned by an atheistic atmosphere, and that evolution of science and technology is a permanent assault on the traditional structure of the church and everything we call religion. From the perspective of theology as we understand it, all human divisions, systems, social and political institutions, all philosophical thoughts, find themselves on the same level, on the side of the created world in its corruption and promise. As Czech theologian Josef Hromdka, the pioneer of Marxist-Christian dialogue, puts it:

The dividing line runs not between communists and non-communists. It runs between the Lord of glory and mercy, on the one hand, and human sinners (whether communists or non-Communists) on the other. Theologically, it is all wrong to see the main line of division between the Christian ideology and civilization, on the one hand, and the non-Christian Weltanschauung on the other.8

This is something which we must always remember. As Hromadka pointed out in a different context:

What matters is whether a Christian in the purity of his faith and his understanding of man joins the struggle and demonstrates by the audacity of his faith, by his love for his neighbour, and his optimism about the future, that he is not just the passive object of history or even of the new society, but rather the co-author and co-architect of the new order.9

At the same time it is our responsibility to examine ourselves, to allow Marxism and modern science and technology in general to challenge our idols and fetishes, our superstition and backwardness, and our lazy attitude toward the real events taking place in our society.

Earlier we found that Marx’s critique of religion is derived from a detailed analysis of the manifestation of nineteenth century religion, and his negation of religion has a predominantly social character. By calling religion an ideology, Marx implies that it provides a transcendent escape for the victims of the class struggle and thus deadens their revolutionary passion for changing their existing order. This is a challenge Christianity must meet. If we examine Marx’s critique carefully, we will recognize that its most important argument is the fact that Christianity during its almost two thousand years of existence, has failed to do away with poverty, servitude, wars and social disorder. Christians have betrayed their mission in the world. They have allowed their faith to be used to support the powerful against the weak, to become a weapon against the small, contributing to their bondage. There is, indeed, much truth in the provocative statement of Martin Luther King, Jr. "How often the church has been an echo rather than a voice, a taillight behind... secular agencies, rather than a headlight guiding men progressively and decisively to higher levels of understanding." 10 We cannot erase easily these facts from the history of Christianity. In the face of these facts, there can be little doubt that Christianity itself has been one of the major causes of atheism in the modern world. We can learn from these past mistakes, and in a spirit of deep humility and penitence before our God acknowledge the guilt of past generations which clings to us who strive today to bear the joyous message of Christ. Christianity must ever be on guard lest it give ground for the suspicion that it is cultivating an ideology which can be exploited by the ruling classes.

Any theory, any idea and philosophy, can be understood in its essence only if we understand the concrete situation in which it originated and if we relate it to our concrete circumstance of life. But the truth of the matter is, very often we Christians forget that an abstract interpretation of prophetic and apostolic message deprives the divine word of its real meaning and relevance. We also forget that the Word of God can be adequately understood and interpreted only in its vital relation to our present human situation. Marx’s critique of religion reminds us that theory must correspond to life needs. This means that religion must arise from the actual life experiences of people and not be dogmatically imposed upon them. Theory and practice must be unified, which involves seeing Christian concepts in their development out of historical experience, and discovering the deeper meaning of the Gospel message by using it to change society. It is with this historical and social consciousness Paul Tillich gave the clarion call to Christians to engage in social action:

The Kingdom of God is not a static heaven into which individuals enter after death; it is the dynamic divine power in and above history which drives history toward ultimate fulfillment. It refers to groups as well as to individuals, and demands continuous efforts toward justice, which is basic in it.11
To be a Christian is not just "to serve God," but it is also a dynamic social ethic, a service to humankind. We may not agree with Feuerbach when he says that theology is anthropology; but we have to admit that there is certainly much anthropology in theology. Although Christianity is directed to the 'beyond', it nevertheless must influence our actions in the realm of the "here below". It must give a deeper meaning to our bond with the world and with history. Solidarity with the agonies and problems of modern men and women become the sacrament of God’s serving presence in the midst of the world. Christians cannot escape into a false mysticism or an illusory transcendentalism, where the affairs and needs of their brothers and sisters are left "here below". It is true that Christians do look beyond the terrible realities of the "here below", but this is not to evade them or to regard them illusory. Rather, by loving and serving people, they prepare for the Lord’s parousia in the very act of love for their brothers and sisters. As Christians, we are always human beings, and human dignity and endeavours must always be of supreme importance. In this sense there can be no radical division between believer and atheist. Marx’s critique of religion challenges Christians for a vision of the human being rooted more deeply in reality. It exhorts Christians to act out the implications of the human being made in the image of God who has become incarnate. It reminds the church of the real concern of the Gospel. The true renunciation of ecclesiastical privileges, a giving up of the gifts of the church to the world, therefore, corresponds to the central movement of the Gospel, the path of God to people, i.e., the saving renunciation of the Son of God on behalf of the world.\(^{12}\)

Marx’s critique of religion is in many ways similar to those of the prophets of the Old Testament. Like the biblical prophets Marx fought against the established religion. Marx’s critique of religious and other forms of alienation is not primarily impelled by metaphysical or even scientific purposes. It is humanistic and prophetic -- in the sense of exposing the depths of good and evil in those issues with which people struggle, suffer, despair, hope, live and die. Prophets have ever been the adversaries of evil gods. They fought against all gods who were not congruous with man’s highest good. Marx’s favourite maxim, "Nihil humani a me alienum puto"\(^{13}\) (I believe that nothing human is alien to me) is illustrative of his concern for humanity.

Theology as self-examination on the part of the church will have to distinguish what is valid in Marx’s critique of religion from what is out of place and false. The valid element in Marx’s critique includes both the observation of the universal sociological conditioning of religious life, and the charge that frequently religion serves the interests of the ruling classes. It also draws our attention to the fact that most Christian movements of renewal limit the thrust of their attack and challenge to the sphere of the private person, remain socially conservative, attacking the heathenism of individuals, but not of institutions. Christians believe that God loves each human being with a unique personal love. Accordingly, Christians will also need to assert the primacy of personal worth in new communitarian modes.

Thus, the question arises, will they incarnate more historically than before their own belief in the "mystical body" of Christ, and the collective destiny of the fully redeemed or ‘liberated’ human race? Let us not forget that the biblical injunction to be watchful is not first of all to be directed to external opponents and temptations, but to those inner dangers and possibilities of degeneration within us. In this connection one would recall how Paul Tillich stressed the importance of this kind of self-examination. Emphasizing the importance of the study of the theoretical foundations of communism, Tillich said:

Since the churches aspire to speak in the name of God, they have to direct every criticism, first of all, against themselves, admitting in this way that they are met by the same judgment as those criticized by them.

Marx’s critique of religion should be considered as a symbol of our lack of prophetic spirit. We have to recognize that the divine judgement over the world was not pronounced by ourselves strongly enough and, consequently, was given into the hands of a secular movement, inimical to the churches. We have to acknowledge this as a divine judgment over ourselves.

What shall, then, be the approach of Christians to Marxist atheists? Helmut Gollwitzer puts it this way:

The non-religious man of the present does not require first to be led to religion, transformed into a religious man, in order then to take a second step along this way to come to the Christian faith. Without his putting himself in a religious frame of mind, creating for himself religious experiences, awakening within himself a so-called natural consciousness of God, thus without his being compelled to adopt forms of consciousness which he can no longer recapture, he must be encountered in his life, which has become secular, by the good news from the Lord of the world, who has committed himself in the man Jesus of Nazareth to the world and the secularity of the stable and the gallows ("without the camp" of religion, Hebrews 13:13)\textsuperscript{15}

It is with the powers of this world, positive and negative, that we have to deal with in religion. For this reason we cannot use the gospel and our theology as defensive weapons in the fight between the religious and the non-religious; rather they are to be used, without prejudice, to discuss with the non-religious the phenomenon and problems of religion and the everlasting love of God. In this way Christian theology becomes both the defender of religion over against the onesidedness and superficiality of Marx’s critique of religion, and at the same time the ally of this critique against the ‘alienation’ of man. Since Marx directs his attacks on religion in the name of man, against the alienation of man from his own potentialities and purposes, it constitutes, for that reason, the greatest challenge to Christianity in our time. It has been pointed out that this challenge could help to purify our descriptions, both of God and Christianity, of all that is human in them. Rather than have recourse to an unproductive apologetics when faced with contemporary atheism, we ought to concern ourselves with weeding out from Christianity what is not authentic, should even be grateful to Marx’s critique of religion for the purifying function which it performs in this way.

The Marxists believe that the church rejects Marxism not primarily because it is atheistic, but because it is revolutionary and because violence has a place in this revolution. It is to be noted here that Marx did not idealize violence as such. His error may be called rather an error of judgment. Believing that the bourgeoisie would not yield their class position without armed resistance, he naturally believed also that overthrow by violence would be necessary. His followers took this point more seriously than the master himself, and they found that religion and class society were slower in dying than expected. That is why communism, a totalitarian form of Marxism, became militant in our time. Of course, Christians will deplore the use of violence, but still they must make up their mind where they will stand should violent revolution or counter-revolution break out, just as they have always had to decide what their position on war should be. It is not then on the use of violence per se that Christians and Marxists part company, but rather on the advocacy of violence and the preaching of its necessity.

The basic trend of their biblical heritage has always pushed Christians to social action. Compared with other religions and spiritual movements, the biblical faith has, displayed an incomparable historical and social initiative. It is up to us, now, in the light of Marx’s critique of religion, to examine whether the church has taken this element seriously. Johannes Baptist Metz underlines this notion in these words:

> Only in the consciousness of their public responsibility can faith and Church take seriously their task of criticizing society. Only thus can the Church avoid becoming merely an ideological superstructure built above a certain existing social order. Only thus can she avoid becoming the final religion of our fully secularized society to which credit is given for certain functions of relief for the individual, but no power to criticize society.16

Thus it is our responsibility to prove that to be a Christian does not mean to be the defender of the established order. The church, certainly, can play a vital role for the transformation of the society.

By means of his critique of religion Marx is directing our attention to the "real distress" of man the "oppressed creature" living in a "heartless world". In so far as Marx is seeking to bring the idea of "real distress" (as understood by religion) into relation with their human condition of distress (as understood by human beings) so as to transform the human condition, his critique of religion reveals an existential pathos", and it is religiously edifying. Marx’s concern for the "self-consciousness of man" lies very close to the religious task of being relevant in the world. Seen in this light Marx’s critique of religion may very well be a "religious criticism" of the world.

Marx’s critique of religion cannot be accepted or refuted merely on the basis of religious dogmas, for the dogmas themselves are to be evaluated on the basis of the "truth of man" and not outside it. Therefore, insofar as Marx’s critique of religion pertains to the "truth of man" it remains in the realm of "religious criticism" since religion proclaims the truth of man and of the world. Marx cannot be ignored as a religious critic simply because he might offend the sentiments of conventional religiosity. He can be ignored only if and when his critique of religion ignores the "truth of man".

We are living in a world come of age. Today nothing can be achieved any longer by means of the traditional location of the concept of God in the gaps of natural science, by means of the assertion that the concept of God is necessary to explain the world, by means of any transformation of the world by theistic proofs. Charles West had this in mind when he remarked:

That realm of nature which used to be beyond human understanding and control, with which, therefore, one could only establish a creative relation by means of this hypothesis ‘God’, is now more and more being conquered by reason and technique.\(^\text{17}\)

Whatever we are to make of Marx’s critique of religion, Christian theology must see in the Marxist identification of Christianity and idealism a warning for the church. It has given us a fruitful impulse for a thorough going self-criticism.

Despite our agreement with his proposed solutions, Marx’s concern falls along the same line as some of the contemporary schools of thought in theology. Perhaps the single most significant result of the new school of liberation theology\(^\text{18}\) is that it represents the final Christian coming-to-terms with Marx, the positive appropriation of Marx’s contribution to modern thought and life.

Today, as ever before, human beings seek authentic human life. In the preceding chapters we found that Marx, through his Promethean role, was trying to achieve this "authentic human life" which human beings seek. We also found that Marx’s critique of religion was in fact an affirmation of human autonomy. It is hoped that the socialist society, as visualized by Marx, gives people more social justice and security, more human dignity, more free time, better standards of living etc. So far so good. But this same society will have to answer an essential question: What is the authentic human life? What is the ultimate meaning of human existence? Here Dietrich Bonhoeffer comes to our aid. Bonhoeffer also proclaimed the autonomy of the human being in a world come of age. But, according to him, it was the crucified and risen Christ who made the autonomy of the human being and the coming of age possible. Bonhoeffer found that the recognition of world’s autonomy is nothing but the knowledge of God which seeks to follow God where He has already preceded us. He also criticized religion, but did not want to abolish religion. He maintained that if the church is to be relevant to our time it must be ready to criticize itself and re-examine its traditional beliefs and practices. He reminds us that the tremendous task and responsibility placed on Christians is to make the secular world recognize the full reality of human life and to show how the Gospel proclaims and realizes it. We must make it clear by our life and theological approach that as Christians we do not live in the air but on earth and that we wish to serve human beings because of Jesus of Nazareth who humbled himself and made himself of no account. This is the contribution that we can make to Marxist-Christian dialogue. We shall now examine to what extent Bonhoeffer’s theology will help in making a corrective of Marx’s critique of religion.

Notes:

Bishop Paulose Mar Paulsoe prefers to call himself a "secular theologian" because he communicates the Christian faith in secular language. He received his Ph.D. from Princeton Theological Seminary for a dissertation on Bonhoeffer’s corrective of Karl Marx. He was a Bishop in the Chaldean Syrian Church in Kerala, India and served as President of the World Student Christian Federation. Published by Christava Sahitya Samithy (CSS), Tiruvalla-689 101, Kerala, S. India. This material was prepared for Religion Online by Ted and Winnie Brock.

Chapter 7: Bonhoeffer’s Concept of "World Come of Age"

Dietrich Bonhoeffer is such a fascinating theologian that he is being read and interpreted both in the East and the West, among Catholics and Protestants, liberals and conservatives, clergy and lay people, students of systematic theology and social action alike. The interest in Bonhoeffer’s writings, especially in his Letters and Papers from Prison, is reminiscent of what Engels said of Feuerbach’s Essence of Christianity:

> Then came Feuerbach’s Essence of Christianity... One must oneself have experienced the liberating effect of this book to get an idea of it. Enthusiasm was general; we all became at once Feuerbachians.¹

Indeed, the influence of Letters and Papers from Prison was so extraordinary that soon after its publication many became Bonhoefferians. As Henry Mottu has pointed out,

> …everything suggests that Bonhoeffer was, and still is, the Feuerbach of what is called (not without exaggeration and

¹
Encounter in Humanization: Insights for Christian-Marxist Dialogue and Cooperation

This does not mean, however, that Bonhoeffer is free from criticism. Among his readers, along with great admirers, there are bitter critics also. This is because, more than any other theologian of our time, he seems to have adopted modes of expression and types of questions which penetrate into the very heart of his readers. There is no doubt that, more than any other works of Bonhoeffer, his Letters and Papers from Prison has been the subject of severe criticism. This book was criticized even by those who praised his earlier works. Karl Barth who had praised Bonhoeffer’s earlier works, the Communion of Saints and the Cost of Discipleship was highly critical of his Letters and Papers from Prison.

Here a word or two has to be said in defence of Bonhoeffer’s Letters. Let us not forget that Bonhoeffer was not writing these letters from his comfortable study, but from the prison cell in the midst of bombing raids and anxieties about life. He was also not unmindful of the prison censors. He was always writing with the uneasy feeling that someone was reading it over his shoulder. And therefore we find in the letters only tantalizing hints of Bonhoeffer’s constructive thinking. In a letter to Eberhard Bethge, the chief recipient and later the editor of Bonhoeffer’s letters from prison, he said:

> You now ask so many important questions on the subjects that have been occupying me lately, that I should be happy if I could answer them myself. But it is all very much in the early stages; and, as usual, I’m being led on more by an instinctive feeling for questions that will arise later than by any conclusions that I’ve already reached about them.\(^3\)

It is clear from Bonhoeffer’s own words that his thinking never got beyond the initial stage. His early death at the hands of the Nazis in 1945 prevented him from adequately working out his ideas. And yet we have to be cautious about those who overemphasize the fragmentary character of Bonhoeffer’s prison writings. These writings were, sure incomplete; but they do not by any means lead us into total confusion. We must also not forget the dialectical element in the prison letters. These letters are by no means to be understood only through the more... sensational passages; rather they are to be understood in the light of his whole theological work and as a stage which he reached in the development of that work. Then we will understand that Bonhoeffer leads us neither to the abandonment of God nor even to the abandonment of religion.

There are not many references to Marx in Bonhoeffer’s writings. However, it is hard to believe that Bonhoeffer was unfamiliar with Marxist philosophy. In the midst of the anti-communist attitude which prevailed in Germany during the Third Reich, probably Bonhoeffer might have thought of not creating an added suspicion in the mind of Hitler by references to Marxism in his writings. Moreover, the challenge of Nazism was more dominant in the 1930’s and early 1940’s than that of Marxism. Anyway, in our present study, the important point is that Bonhoeffer’s critique of religion has left an impression somewhat similar to that left by Marx’s critique. Like Marx, Bonhoeffer glorified in the powers of human being and dreaded the often disruptive and retarding effect of religion upon these powers. Like Marx, Bonhoeffer wanted to speak to human beings in their strength, in their wholehearted life and aspirations. This is why Bonhoeffer has been so popular among Christian theologians and Marxist philosophers in East Europe. What is important to note is that in spite of the similarities between Marx and Bonhoeffer there is a striking difference which is crucial for our enquiry: Bonhoeffer’s critique of religion grew from, and was directed toward, an extraordinary faith in Christ, Lord of the world. Without this faith such a critique would be impossible. The foundation for the Christian encounter with Marxism is found in Bonhoeffer’s theology in the more basic framework of the confrontation of Christ with the world. His thoughts will, therefore, help us to formulate and synthesize an adequate theological approach to Marxism.

When Bonhoeffer explains what he means by religion he connects it in his mind with such terms as ‘metaphysical’, ‘individualistic’, etc. A religious interpretation of Christianity would be a metaphysical or an individualistic one. This kind of interpretation is valid only as long as man is ‘religious’. But Bonhoeffer asks: what if man is no longer religious, no longer concerned with the answers given by a religious interpretation of things? What if man is not inherently religious? What happens if the religious a priori upon which Christian preaching and theology have rested for the last nineteen hundred years simply does not exist? Bonhoeffer is convinced that modern man cannot be religious even if he thinks he is and wants to be. If he describes himself as
Encounter in Humanization: Insights for Christian-Marxist Dialogue and Cooperation

...religious, it is obvious that he does not live up to it, or that he means something quite different. If religion is no more than a "garment of Christianity" which must now be cast aside because it has lost its meaning in a "world come of age", if the real problem facing Christianity today is not so much that of religionlessness, but precisely that of religion, then what does all this mean for the church? These are the questions Bonhoeffer poses before us.

Bonhoeffer maintains that if the church is to be relevant to our time it must be ready to criticize itself and re-examine its traditional beliefs and practices. The task of theology is to consider our traditional testimony of faith as a thing for which we must answer in the present. As Daniel Jenkins asserts, "the only way in which religion can be effectively criticized is from within. The reason for this is that the only criterion for the criticism is that provided by God himself in faith." This is exactly what Bonhoeffer does. He does not want to abolish religion. But he wishes to free Christianity from any necessary dependence upon "the religious premise". Our study will not be fruitful unless we clearly understand from the outset that Bonhoeffer’s concepts such as "world come of age", "non-religious interpretation", "religionless Christianity", etc. are no more, and no less, than a striving after a more adequate expression of faith working through love in maturity and freedom.

In the first part of the present study we learned that the world in which we live is in revolution, and that it was Marx’s prophetic function which gave this revolution its most radical and consistent expression in the secular world. The world has come of age in organizational, rational, and technical competence. Vast areas which once were left to the operation of natural forces are now under human control. The world has, thus, become non-religious in the sense that "God as working hypothesis in morals, politics, or science, has been surmounted and abolished." The realm of inward experience of the soul, where the life of piety used to take place, that realm of conscience, of salvation, of eternal life, of communion with a transcendent Being beyond the bounds of this earth, has faded into the background of people’s consciousness. It seems no longer important. People are busy serving themselves or their neighbours with their technical reason. They don’t have time to worry about supposedly ultimate problems. The world has become mature in that it has dispensed with metaphysics, including religious metaphysics, and conducts its life on the basis of its own relative principles and knowledge, as if God did not exist.
Now, it is to Bonhoeffer that we owe the insight that the maturity of this world is a fact of God’s providence in our time. Revolutionary impulses and Christian apologetics alike reorganize this fact. Sooner or later everyone will have to accept this. Where is Christ in such a world as this? Christ reveals to us in God’s love, God’s being and act, Christ is in the middle of this mature world, reconciling it to Himself out of its sin and rebellion. It is the reality of God who has come into this world in Jesus Christ.

In Christ we are offered the possibility of partaking in the reality of God and in the reality of the world, but not in the one without the other. The reality of God discloses itself only by setting me entirely in the reality of the world, and when I encounter the reality of the world it is always already sustained, accepted and reconciled in the reality of God.\textsuperscript{7}

This is the encounter with the secular, the mature world to which the Christian is called.

But what has been the reaction of the church to the development whereby the God of religion has been edged out of the world as the world has come to a self-assured adulthood? The whole movement has been viewed as "the great defection from God, from Christ."\textsuperscript{8} and the more that God and Christ have been invoked in opposition to the development, the more it has considered itself to be anti-Christian. Christian apologetics has tried to prove to the world that the world could not live without the tutelage of God, but it has been fighting a losing war surrendering one battlefield after another. Bonhoeffer considers the attack by Christian apologetics upon the adulthood of the world to be pointless, ignoble and unchristian:

\begin{quote}
Pointless, because it seems to me like an attempt to put a grown-up man back into adolescence, i.e., to make him dependent, as things as which he is in fact no longer dependent, and thrusting him into problems that are, in fact, no longer problems to him. Ignoble, because it amounts to an attempt to exploit man’s weakness for purposes that are alien to him and to which he has not freely assented. Unchristian, because it confuses Christ with the particular stage in man’s religiousness, i.e., with a human law.\textsuperscript{9}
\end{quote}
This apologia has been carried on by religious people, who have used God as a "stopgap for their incompleteness of knowledge." This insight gives rise to Bonhoeffer’s own reaction to religious and religionless people.

I often ask myself why a Christian instinct" often draws me more to the religionless people than to the religious, by which I don’t in the least mean with any evangelizing intention, but, I might almost say, "in brotherhood". While I am often reluctant to mention God by name to religious people—because that name somehow seems to me here not to ring true, and I feel myself to be slightly dishonest (it’s particularly bad when others start to talk in religious jargon; I then dry up almost completely and feel awkward and uncomfortable) to people with no religion I can on occasion mention him by name quite calmly and as a matter of course. Religious people speak of God when human knowledge (perhaps simply because they are too lazy to think) has come to an end, or when human resources fail -- in fact it is always the deus ex machina that they bring on to the scene, either for the apparent solution of insoluble problems, or as strength in human failure -- always, that is to say, exploiting human weakness or human boundaries.10

Even though God is driven out of the world by the surrender of the church in one area after another, there seems to be one sphere in which religious answers remained secure, and that is the sphere of the so-called ultimate questions (death, suffering, guilt, etc.) i.e., the sphere of man’s inner life. If God alone can furnish an answer to the ultimate questions, then at least there is some reason why God and the church and the pastor are needed. Here again Bonhoeffer asks, if we can talk of God only on the "borders of human existence, in the "boundary situations", are we not in the final analysis trying to make room for God in the world? Are we not assigning Him his place in the world? Even in these areas, Bonhoeffer reminds us, answers are to be found nowadays that leave God right out of the picture. It is not true that only Christianity has the answers". In fact, it is Bonhoeffer’s opinion that the Christian answers are no more conclusive or compelling than any of the others.11

Here the church that clung to its religious interpretation and has restricted God to the private life of the human being comes face to face with what Bonhoeffer calls "the secularized offshoots of Christian theology, namely existentialist philosophy and the psychotherapists." They, too, have the answer to life’s problems, the solution to its distresses and conflicts, and their answer does not depend on God. They, too, enter into the secret recesses of man’s inner, personal life and try to demonstrate to secure, happy, contented mankind that he is really unhappy and desperate, that his health is sickness, his vigour and vitality are despair. This sort of "secular methodism" has its ecclesiastical counterpart in the clergy’s "priestly sniffing around" in the lives of men to bring to light their sins of weakness. Bonhoeffer believes that there is a two-fold theological error here: first, the notion that human beings can be addressed as sinners only on the basis of their weakness; second, the idea that one’s essential nature consists of one’s inner life. Jesus did not make every person a sinner first; he called people out of their sin, not into it. Again, the Bible does not recognize our distinction between ‘outer’ and ‘inner’, but is concerned with the whole person in relation to God. Bonhoeffer believes it is imperative that the church give up all "clerical tricks" and stop regarding psychotherapy and existentialism as "God’s pioneers". The church must take an entirely different approach to a world come of age. And therefore Bonhoeffer says:

I should like to speak of God not on the boundaries but at the centre, not in weakness but in strength; and therefore not in death and guilt but in man’s life and goodness. As to the boundaries, it seems to me better to be silent and leave the insoluble unsolved... God is beyond in the midst of our life. The church stands, not at the boundaries where human powers give out, but in the middle of the village.

We shall now examine what Bonhoeffer actually meant by the phrase "the world come of age". When Bonhoeffer speaks of the maturity of the world come of age, he does not mean the "adult maturity of the wise old sage". Rather he gives the description of a situation. Maturity marks the time of responsibility. Man come of age is in no sense a perfect man or man who does not commit sin. He is a man accepting responsibility. By the use of his reason man has gradually discovered the laws by which the world lives and is regulated, not only in science, but also in social and political affairs, art, ethics and religion, and in the name of intellectual honesty he no longer uses God as a working hypothesis. Man has been left with the world on his hands. Man’s attention has been turned away from worlds beyond, and toward this world and this time. It is in this sense that he is living in a world come of age. In the childhood of humanity men thought of God as the deus ex machina. Now that man has come of age, he thinks and lives independent of God. The premises of the religion of the childhood of humanity have disappeared. If the church can be no more in the modern world than a sort of "religious drugstore" or "religious comfort station" Bonhoeffer believes, its fate is already sealed.

Bonhoeffer speaks of the world come of age only in the context of a world which no longer needs the religious premise which has long characterized Christian preaching, devotion and self-understanding. The man come of age is one whose work, family, education, and awareness of the world have made daily recourse to God unnecessary. Bonhoeffer would have us think of the world come of age as revealing God’s gift of freedom and of the world to man.

Thus the world’s coming of age is no longer an occasion for polemics and apologetics, but is now really better understood than it understands itself, namely on the basis of the gospel and in the light of Christ.\(^\text{16}\)

The man of age affirms the temporal, this-worldly character of existence. There is, for him, only this world; there is no other world. He is concerned with the tasks and problems of this world. He is disturbed to notice that the religious man is more interested in eternity and the otherworldly. Because the mind of the religious man is taken up with the ‘world to come’ and with the desire to attain salvation in that world, he is said to have neglected the problems of this world. For him praying, worshipping, singing hymns, fasting, meditating, going on retreats and such are the most important activities of life. But for the man come of age such practices seem shadowy and unreal by comparison with our secular activities. He is critical of the time that the religious man spends in prayer and worship.

This is why Bonhoeffer insists that we must love God in our lives:

> I believe that we ought so to love and trust God in our lives, and in all the good things that he sends us, that when the time comes (but not before) we may go to him with love, trust, and joy... We ought to find and love God in what he actually gives us; if it pleases him to allow us to enjoy some overwhelming earthly happiness, we must not try to be more pious than God himself and allow our happiness to be corrupted by presumption and arrogance, and by unbridled religious fantasy which is never satisfied with what God gives.\textsuperscript{17}

We have to accept gratefully the earthly affections, pleasures, health, achievements and knowledge as the blessings of God. Bonhoeffer repeatedly speaks of the natural, the earthly, the human, because Christ is the "new Man", the "True Humanity." This helps us to recognize the world come of age. Bonhoeffer would have us stop thinking of world come of age primarily as a turning away from God, for he is not speaking of atheism, and would not describe himself as an atheist. Rather he believes that, since man has ceased to be religious and since the laws which he has discovered have their origin and essence in Jesus Christ, today’s godless, secular man is ripe for Christian message that Jesus Christ is the Lord of the world, that the world stands ever before God, the one who is Creator, Reconciler and Redeemer and who refuses to be a \textit{deus ex machina}. This is what Bonhoeffer means when he asserts that "the world that has come of age is more godless, and perhaps for that very reason nearer to God, than the world before its coming of age."\textsuperscript{18} This is no sanctioning of the world’s godlessness, but rather a recognition that it is a hopeful godlessness. "Our coming of age", says Bonhoeffer, "leads us to a true recognition of our situation before God".\textsuperscript{19} It is by this reasoning, namely, by a bold effort to answer the question of how Jesus Christ can become Lord even of the religionless, that Bonhoeffer arrived at his conclusion that the church should work out and proclaim a "non-religious" interpretation of Biblical and theological concepts.

Bonhoeffer proclaimed the world’s coming of age in the name of the crucified and risen Christ and saw it as a necessary part of his Christology. It was the crucified and risen Christ who made possible the coming of age. Bonhoeffer found that the recognition of the world’s autonomy is neither philosophy nor phenomenology, but the knowledge of God which seeks to follow God where He has already preceded us. That is why Bonhoeffer’s statement about the world come of age is first and last a theological statement. A curse or blessing is always pronounced over something that has come into being, determining its future progress. It was hitherto the case that the church not only did not bless the autonomously evolving world, but condemned it and called it godless. If the church makes no declaration that the world has come of age, then the world itself must declare its autonomy.
Bonhoeffer says further that the knowledge of the world’s coming of age can help us to a better understanding of the Gospel.

To that extent we may say that the development towards the world’s coming of age outlined above, which has done away with a false conception of God, opens up a way of seeing the God of the Bible, who wins power and space in the world by his weakness.20

The lordship of Christ corresponds to worldliness, and discipleship to a sharing in this world; the natural, the profane, the rational and the humane are placed not against but with this Christ -- this is what Bonhoeffer means by the phrase "world come of age."

The implications of Bonhoeffer’s concept of "world come of age" are significant for our encounter with Marxism. We can understand it better in the light of the ongoing debate on secularization and secularism. Secularization is the result of the self-understanding of man. Science and technology, of course, have played a vital role in this changed outlook of man. Man perceives himself as a creative subject. He becomes aware that he is an agent of history, responsible for his own destiny. This new self-understanding of man necessarily brings in its wake a different way of conceiving his relationship with God. As Gustavo Gutierrez observes, secularization is a process which not only coincides perfectly with a Christian vision of man, of history, and of the cosmos; it also favours a more complete fulfillment of Christian life insofar as it offers man the possibility of being more fully human.21 He adds:

Biblical faith does indeed affirm the existence of creation as distinct from the Creator; it is the proper sphere of man, whom God himself has proclaimed lord of this creation. Worldliness, therefore, is a must, a necessary condition for an authentic relationship between man and nature, of men among themselves, and finally, between man and God.22

Secularism, on the other hand, refers to the more rigid attitude of those who hold that only through science is any trustworthy knowledge to be attained and that only the tangible and human affairs of this world are worthy of attention.
Worth mentioning here is the excellent study made by Friedrich Gogarten on the distinction between secularization and secularism. According to him, secularization refers to the historical process itself which we described above. Secularism, on the contrary, is an ideology which tends to contain this process within a framework which excludes all religious values.23

It is easy to understand from this description of Gogarten that Bonhoeffer’s concept of world come of age falls under the category of secularization and that Marx’s description of world’s autonomy falls under the ideology of secularism. Bonhoeffer’s radical acceptance of secularization does not at all rule out a life which is lived in an arcane discipline (Arkandisziplin) of prayer and meditation, of study, worship and silence. While his invitation to affirm the world’s coming of age has all the marks of a new theological version of the Enlightenment, he also urges Christians to be disciplined, to avoid "the shallow and banal this worldliness of the enlightened (Aufgeklarten)".24 At the same time he wants us to turn from God’s beyond to the world’s here and now, from church to world. Here it is not simply a matter of abandoning God’s beyond, of passing from church to world, from prayer to work, but of rethinking transcendence as the centre of our lives. "God is beyond in the midst of our life."25 The world come of age is not nearer to God than to the world of tutelage; indeed, it is more godless, "and perhaps for that very reason nearer to God."26 This dialectical tension found in Bonhoeffer’s thought is significant that it remains a solid Christian response to the autonomy of the world Marx proclaims. Living wholeheartedly in the world is neither an abandonment of God nor a revolt against God; rather it is accepting the freedom given by God with a sense of responsibility. Bonhoeffer is certain that if faith is to have any chance at all of being non-religious, it must ultimately be not so much a candidacy for the next world but rather a complete acceptance of responsibility for the world. He takes freedom and responsibility seriously in the light of the scripture:

In the language of the Bible, freedom is not something man has for himself but something he has for others... Freedom is not a quality of man, nor is it an ability, a capacity, a kind of being that somehow flares up in him... In truth, freedom is a relationship between two persons. Being free means "being free for the other", because the other has bound me to him. Only in relationship with the Bonhoeffer maintains that the freedom and responsibility to which we are called presupposes the going out of ourself and the breaking down of our selfishness. The fullness of the world come of age is communion with others. "Thus the autonomy of 'the world come of age', of which he (Bonhoeffer) now begins to speak, is not to be understood as the freedom of a Titan, but rather a freedom born of humility."

Before we proceed to the necessary non-religious interpretation, we shall now consider what the implications of the world come of age are for the contemporary church. The autonomy of the world come of age which Bonhoeffer speaks is to be understood as a realization born of humility. We must confess that we are disturbed when we realize that human hope and the world’s coming of age are inescapably connected. One of our shortcomings is that, when particular areas of life which once were under direct ecclesiastical control become autonomous, we assume that this represents a victory for faithless secularism. It is true that this autonomy can be achieved in such a way as to deny God’s lordship. But at the same time we must admit the possibility that it can be achieved in such a way as to express true Christian maturity in freedom. This admission will help us to evaluate our encounter with Marxism and will show us a new vista of strategy to fulfil our tasks in relation to secular institutions.

The guiding principle for Christians in this realm is that of identification with the world. "The only way to follow Jesus was by living in the world." We are part of the world Christ came to save and we cannot participate in his saving act unless we do so at those places in the world where we live alongside fellow human beings, whether or not they bear a Christian name. We Christians must try to discover the will of God not in the life of the church but also in the various spheres of our secular calling. Christ meets us in the Bible, in the preaching, in the sacraments and in the fellowship of the church; but he also meets us no less in the spirit at all places where we have to make a decision. As Daniel Jenkins stated, the primary task of the church is not to safeguard her earthly form as one institution among many, but to make manifest the transforming power of Christ in the life of mankind every day, through the institutions of the family, the school, the state, the industrial organization and all others which make up the fabric of the life of mankind. God called Israel, and calls us, not for the sake of any special worthiness or favour, but for the sake of the world. In other words, the Church is called to the service of humankind and of the world. This is election not to privilege, but to engagement in servanthood. The church lives in order that the world may know its true being. God calls us in order to send us back into the world as His witness. This means that the church has a mission; that is to say, the church is sent by God for a special purpose. Her purpose, her special concern, is not just to convert individuals into church members, but to make a whole approach to society and to all parts of life.

So to sum up Bonhoeffer’s thoughts on "world come of age": obviously, by this phrase he means two things. First, the large measure of control given man over nature by the discovery of the scientific method. Second, the awareness that the modern man is no longer under either the tutelage or the control of ‘god’, but is called to freedom and responsibility. He does not need religion in the limited sense nor is he able to live for long on the basis of behaviour dictated by institutions for which he holds uncritical reverence. He is compelled now to live with his freedom. He is heir to the Messianic Kingdom and has been compelled to enter into some of the privileges and responsibilities of his heritage. The coming of age of man means that he cannot live any longer under the ‘gods’. He can only find the fulfillment of his freedom in the bond service of Christ.

Bonhoeffer is increasingly aware that there is a radical disparity between the world into which he was born and the world of the second world war. This new world is one in which there is no traditional culture or faith as a ground beneath one’s feet. It is a world in which "the great masquerade of evil" is manifest, and in which rationalism, moral fanaticism, conscience, and duty have failed. Who can face this world?

Only the man whose final standard is not his reason, his principles, his conscience, his freedom, or his virtue, but who is ready to sacrifice all this when he is called to obedient and responsible action in faith and in exclusive allegiance to God -- the responsible man, who tries to make his whole life an answer to the question and call of God. How is it possible to be obedient and responsible people with exclusive allegiance to God? Certainly not by confining ourselves within the walls... of the church, but by our serving presence in the world. But the religion of the childhood of humanity has always been an obstacle for this serving presence, and now the modern men and women have realized that they can get along quite well without such a religion. Observing that the death of religion is an established fact and is a historic liberating force for the world Bonhoeffer can accept a world built upon and daily guided by secular hopes. He finds the religionless condition of the twentieth century person to be the foundation for the new from Christianity. By this he does not mean new institutional patterns, but rather a drastic change in the church’s inner self-awareness. He finds the guidelines for this new understanding of the church in what he calls "non-religious interpretation" of Biblical and theological concepts.

Notes:

6. LPP, op. cit., p.360 (16 July 1944)

8. LPP, op. cit., p. 326 (8 June 1944)

10. LPP, op. cit., pp. 281f (30 April 1944). ‘deux ex machina’ (Greek) means ‘god from machinery’ in Greek and Roman drama, a god brought on to save a seemingly impossible situation.

11. LPP, op. cit., pp 311f (29 May 1944)

30. Daniel Jenkins, op.cit., p.82.

32. LPP, op. cit., p.5 ("After ten Years: A Reckoning Made at New Year 1943").

Bishop Paulose Mar Paulsoe prefers to call himself a "secular theologian" because he communicates the Christian faith in secular language. He received his Ph.D. from Princeton Theological Seminary for a dissertation on Bonhoeffer’s corrective of Karl Marx. He was a Bishop in the Chaldean Syrian Church in Kerala, India and served as President of the World Student Christian Federation. Published by Christava Sahitya Samithy (CSS), Tiruvalla-689 101, Kerala, S. India. This material was prepared for Religion Online by Ted and Winnie Brock.

Chapter 8: Non-Religious Interpretation

Bonhoeffer’s concepts of "non-religious interpretation" and "religionless Christianity" have attracted widespread attention. Though both these concepts are inter-related, in the German speaking countries the discussion has focussed on the expression ‘non-religious interpretation, whereas in the English world the key phrase has been "religionless Christianity". Both concepts are important for an adequate understanding of the development of Bonhoeffer’s thinking. In this chapter we shall examine the concept of "non-religious interpretation".

Bonhoeffer wanted faith to be understood as a demand to live radically in the midst of the world:

it is only completely in this world that one learns to have faith. One must completely abandon any attempt to make something of oneself, whether it be a saint, or a converted sinner, or a churchman ( a so-called priestly type!), a righteous man or an unrighteous one, a sick man or a healthy one. By this—worldliness I mean living unreservedly in life’s duties, problems, successes and failures, experiences and perplexities. In so doing we throw ourselves completely into the arms of God, taking seriously, not our own sufferings, but those of God in the world—watching with Christ in Gethsemane. That, I think, is faith; that is metanoia; and that is how one becomes a man and a Christian (cf. Jer. 45).¹

This is the direction in which he would have the Biblical concepts guide us. They are to be interpreted in terms of responsible involvement in the world. Metaphysical and individualistic terms cannot perform that function, and that is why he calls for a non-religious interpretation.

But what exactly did Bonhoeffer mean by "non-religious interpretation"? Instead of "non-religious interpretation" sometimes Bonhoeffer also uses the expressions "worldly interpretation" and "secular interpretation". As one of his more perceptive interpreters have pointed out, "It is much easier to grasp what (Bonhoeffer) meant by ‘religious than nonreligious’."² Therefore, let us begin our discussion of nonreligious interpretation, first by considering what actually Bonhoeffer meant by the term ‘religious’.

Even during the early days in the prison Bonhoeffer expressed growing intolerance of the ‘religious’. He wrote:

> Don’t be alarmed; I shall not come out of here a homo religiosus! On the contrary, my fear and distrust of ‘religiosity’ have become greater than ever here. The fact that the Israelites never uttered the name of God always makes me think, and I can understand it better as I go on.³

And so later, we find, Bonhoeffer rejected the thesis of "religious a priori". He explained this rejection profoundly in these words:

> The time when people could be told everything by means of words, whether theological or pious, is over, and so is the time of inwardness and conscience -- and that means the time of religion in general. We are moving towards a completely religionless time; people as they are now simply cannot be religious any more. Even those who honestly describe themselves as ‘religious’ do not in the least act up to it, and so they presumably mean something quite different by ‘religious’.
Our whole nineteen hundred year old Christian preaching and theology rest on the ‘religious a priori’ of mankind. ‘Christianity’ has always been a form -- perhaps the true form -- of ‘religion’. But if one day it becomes clear that this a priori does not exist at all, but was a historically conditioned and transient form of human self-expression, and if therefore man becomes radically religionless and I think that is already more or less the case (else how is it, for example, that this war, in contrast to all previous ones, is not calling forth any ‘religious’ reaction?) what does that mean for ‘Christianity’?4

In the Prison Letters Bethge identifies several characteristics of Bonhoeffer’s view of religion. Though some of these characteristics may look insignificant to us, Bonhoeffer considers them actually present in religion in such a way as to limit the challenge of Jesus Christ to specific directions. Let us consider here six of these characteristics.

"To ‘interpret in a religious sense’... I think it means to speak on the one hand metaphysically."5 Bonhoeffer criticizes religion as a metaphysically determined entity. Here, he is not thinking in terms of "immanence- transcendence", in order then to eliminate transcendence in favour of immanence. Rather, he is concerned to regain a genuine this-worldly transcendence, in contrast to a valueless metaphysics, as a "partial extension of the world" 6 and as a necessary prerequisite to any faith.

It is not with the beyond that we are concerned, but with this world as created and preserved, subjected to laws, reconciled and restored. What is above this world is, in the Gospel, intended to exist for this world.7

"To ‘interpret in a religious sense ... means to speak ... on the other hand individualistically."8 Here Bonhoeffer’s criticism is against religion as an individualistic entity. He considered the time of religion to have been "the time of inwardness and conscience".9 As early as 1927, in Sanctorum Communio, Bonhoeffer emphasized the social element in all Christian concepts. In a world come of age he became more aggressive to this social element and criticized the old individualistic inwardness.

Bonhoeffer maintains that the Biblical understanding of God directs us to a powerless and suffering God who is with us and who calls us to share his suffering for the sake of the world. In contrast to this, "Man’s religiosity makes him look in his distress to the power of God in the world: God is the deus ex machina." On another occasion he says:

Religious people speak of God when human knowledge (perhaps simply because they are too lazy to think) come to an end, or when human resources fall -- in fact it is always the deus ex machina that they bring on to the scene, either for the apparent solution of insoluble problems, or as strength in human failure -- always, that is to say, exploiting human weakness or human boundaries.

This same criticism of religion is found in his poem "Christians and Pagans": "Men go to God when they are sore bestead." Christian religion is made out to be a sort of religious drug store, an escape from real life and from mature responsibility for it. God does not stand in to fill the gaps. Bonhoeffer has stated this point with much clarity in the letter of Christmas Eve, 1943:

> It is nonsense to say that God fills the gap; he doesn’t fill it, but on the contrary, he keeps it empty and so helps us to keep alive our former communion with each other, even at the cost of pain.

Another characteristic of religion, as Bonhoeffer finds it, is what he calls its nature of partiality. He observes that Christian religion has become a separate part among the other parts of life, a mere section of the whole. This is because of the partial nature of religion in contrast to "faith". "The ‘religious act’ is always something partial, ‘faith’ is something whole, involving the whole of one’s life."

A further characteristic of the religion is its privileged character. Bonhoeffer constantly fought to overcome unwarranted religious privilege. This concern may be recognized in one of the questions he raises:

> In what way are we "religionless- secular" Christians, in what way are we the ecclesia, those who are called forth, not regarding ourselves from a religious point of view as
He points out that religion has become essentially a way of distinguishing people: Christians against non-Christians, theists against atheists, or white against coloured people.

Closely connected with the privileged character of religion we find another characteristic to which Bonhoeffer points, namely, the role religion plays as the guardian of man. Religion takes for granted that man has not yet become mature. He finds fault with "religious interpretation" in that it establishes priests and theologians as the guardians and rulers of the people of the church, and thus creates in them a state of dependence. "The church must share in the secular problems of ordinary human life, not dominating, but helping and serving." Bonhoeffer urges us to accept responsibility to others and to make possible the mature cooperation and partnership of the world.

It is true that Bonhoeffer’s critique of religion, in its most comprehensive historical, psychological and theological form, is found in his prison writings. But this does not mean that the critique of religion is something which he developed only during the prison days. His earlier writings show clear indication of his growing uneasiness toward religion. For example, in some of his writings he rejected religion as a purely spiritual, inner, pious feeling which offered "emotional uplift" and was based on human needs and desires. As a young assistant minister in Spain he already expressed thoughts that read like an anticipation of his last writings. Thus he wrote as early as 1928 in a letter to Helmut Rossler,

One thing that strikes me again and again: here one meets people as they are, away from the masquerade of the "Christian world", people with passions, criminal types, little people with little ambitions, little desires and little sins, all in all people who feel homeless in both senses of the word, who loosen up if one talks to them ~ a friendly way, real people; I can only say that I have gained the impression that it is just these people who are much more under grace than under wrath, and that it is the Christian world which is more under wrath than under grace.
expected God to satisfy personal needs, a theme central in prison letters. Another theme found in an earlier writing, which Bonhoeffer developed later in the letters, is the provincial, limited character of religion, in contrast to genuine faith which encompasses the whole life. His attack on the other-worldliness of religion is found in a 1932 address, "Thy Kingdom Come!" Other worldliness is rooted in human weakness whereas Christ "makes man strong".\textsuperscript{18}

Once we understand Bonhoeffer’s criticism of ‘religious’, then it is rather easy to understand what he meant by "non-religious". The critique of religion, as we enumerated it in the preceding paragraphs, confronted Bonhoeffer immediately with a new problem: finding a non-religious language to interpret the Biblical and theological concepts. Obviously this meant taking the adulthood of the world seriously; also it precludes using God in relation to our deficiencies. Bonhoeffer agonized with this problem in a meditation he prepared for the occasion of the baptism of Bethge’s son, Dietrich Wilhem Rudiger. He reflected upon how the ancient words pronounced over the child would be perhaps equally an enigma to the baby and to the adults who heard them:

Reconciliation and redemption, regeneration and the Holy Spirit, love of our enemies, cross and resurrection, life in Christ and Christian discipleship all these things are so difficult and so remote that we hardly venture any more to speak of them.\textsuperscript{19}

These have been rendered meaningless by a scientifically and technologically oriented culture. Therefore, Bonhoeffer calls for a new language which will be capable of renewing and changing the world:

It will be a new language, perhaps quite non-religious, but liberating and redeeming as was Jesus’ language; it will be the language of a new righteousness and truth, proclaiming God’s peace with men and the coming of His kingdom.\textsuperscript{20}

In undertaking a non-religious interpretation of Biblical and theological concepts such as he proposes, Bonhoeffer believes the church would only be permitting the Bible to assume its own true character; for the Bible knows nothing of the ‘religious’ in the sense enumerated above. Religion is concerned with ‘inwardness’; the Bible with the whole person. Religion is ‘individualistic’, while the Bible is concerned with corporate existence. Religion is ‘metaphysical’, i.e., interested in a world beyond, whereas the Bible is concerned with the renewal of this world. This non-religiousness is clear both in the Old Testament and in the New Testament. We should remember that "Jesus calls men, not to a new religion, but to life." Christ calls us out of our "being- for-self" into sharing his suffering for the world, into "being- for- others’. "That, I think, is faith: that is metanoia; and that is how one becomes a man and a Christian."\textsuperscript{21} This central confrontation, this being called to participate in the suffering of Christ, must be, Bonhoeffer says, the starting point of our "secular interpretation".

Bonhoeffer’s non-religious interpretation is concerned not only with hermeneutical question, but with the question of the existence of the church itself. It was Bonhoeffer’s conviction that only a church whose message is a part of her own being, a church who witnesses in obedience to her own ultimate concern through her actions, is able to interpret and proclaim the word of God to a world come of age.

Bonhoeffer begins the non-religious interpretation with this concern for the church. He wants to apply this kind of interpretation to all central concepts of theology. He has dealt extensively with this interpretation especially in his approach to the theological concepts of faith, repentance, God, Christ, sin and the church. For example, in his references to sin he wants to begin in the centre: "It is not the sins of weakness, but the sins of strength, which matter here."\textsuperscript{22} His method is also seen in his view of the church in the centre of life, living wholly for the world. As Clifford Green has pointed out, "From the centre of life, under the lordship of the servant Christ, for the world: this is the manner of the non-religious interpretation."\textsuperscript{23}

We should remember that Bonhoeffer’s non-religious interpretation does not arise out of any doubts about Christ, but is first and last a Christological interpretation. He always tries to pursue Christological questions by means of interpretation. This interrelation between non-religious interpretation and Christological interpretation was so vital for Bonhoeffer that he lost interest when the two elements were separated: Christology not qualified by something like non-religious interpretation became an unrelated entity and suffered a fatal loss of reality; nonreligious Christianity without Christocentrism became a Sisyphean endeavour of modem man to adjust to a Bonhoeffer’s criticism of ‘religious’ interpretation of the faith arises precisely because it either diminishes God’s concern for the world or refuses to recognize Christ’s lordship over the world. In other words, the necessity of non-religious interpretation arises for Bonhoeffer precisely out of faith in Jesus Christ. It derives from the very heart of his theology, from his Christology. The centrality of Christ in Bonhoeffer’s theology can clearly be seen in his Ethics. What matters in the church is not religion but the form of Christ, and its taking form amidst a band of men. The problem as well as necessity of non-religious interpretation is posed before us by way of introducing a question with which he is struggling: "What is bothering me incessantly is the question what Christianity really is, or indeed who Christ really is, for us today.”

Even common ways of speaking of Jesus Christ have become for him deeply problematical. "It is only when one knows the unutterability of the name of God that one can utter the name of Jesus Christ."

He wanted to explain the present age in terms of the Bible, and not the Bible in terms of the present age. Bonhoeffer maintained that interpreting the Bible in terms of the present age is to make man the measure of the Gospel rather than to learn from the Gospel the true norm for human existence. In this lecture, as well as in all the other writings of Bonhoeffer, the norm and standard of all "re-presentation" is Jesus Christ.

Bonhoeffer’s’ Christological interpretation of the Old Testament appears in his lecture delivered in the winter semester 1932-33 at the University of Berlin. There he says, for example, that God’s creation of the world out of nothing is already Gospel. "From the beginning the world is placed in the sign of the resurrection of Christ from the dead." The Christological references are even more explicit in his Bible study entitled King David (1935). He interprets the entire career of David in the light of Christ. Bonhoeffer’s two short studies on Psalms also gives us an indication of his Christological interpretations. Here David, who is said to be the author of many psalms, is described as "a prototype of Jesus Christ".

The Song of Songs fascinated Bonhoeffer because of its earthiness, naturalness and unblushing but nonprurient sensuality. Bonhoeffer sees real significance in its inclusion in the Old Testament:
Even in the Bible we have the Song of Songs; and really one can imagine no more ardent, passionate, sensual love than is portrayed there (see 7.6). It’s a good thing that the book is in the Bible, in face of all those who believe that the restraint of passion is Christian (where is there such restraint in the Old Testament?)\textsuperscript{29}

The classical interpretation of Song of Songs is to treat it as an allegory of Christ and the church. Bonhoeffer rejects this ‘spiritualized’ treatment in favour of a literal and natural one: "I must say I should prefer to read it as an ordinary love song, and that is probably the best ‘Christological’ exposition".\textsuperscript{30} It is precisely by reading the Song of Songs as a poem about the joys and beauties of earthly love between a man and a woman that we read it Christologically. For Christ is the man at the center of life, the man who exists for others in all the concrete encounters and activities of daily life.

Bonhoeffer’s Biblical exegesis in the 1930’s raised the question: "What is Christ asking of us today?" In other words, Bonhoeffer was trying to interpret the scripture from the church’s point of view. Now, in the prison writings the question takes on a still deeper form: Who is Jesus Christ for the man who can no longer take religion seriously -- the man who fully felt the impact of the Marxian and Darwinian and Freudian revolutions? Who is Christ if the religious premise has to be cut away from the church? Thus, the question is above all a question about Christ, not man. We must apply all our attention to the task, asserts Bonhoeffer, to answer the question "Who Christ really is, for us today"-- not merely in the traditional, standardized and ineffectual religious terms, but fully, personally and responsibly. Bonhoeffer’s summons for a non-religious interpretation of Biblical and theological concepts is only to see Christ more sharply.

In the outline for the book he intended to write, Bonhoeffer asks a very important question:

What do we really believe? I mean, believe in such a way that we stake our lives on it? The problem of the Apostle’s Creed? "What must I believe?" is the wrong question.\textsuperscript{31}

Bonhoeffer’s answer to this question may be a key to his non-religious interpretation. To believe in the church, the word of God, justification, etc., Bonhoeffer says, a man must have brought these mysteries into his life and integrated them into the pattern of his values, commitments and hopes. At the point of integration, justification is no longer a Biblical word, but has a profound personal meaning -- a meaning palpable and concrete for that individual. The concrete interpretation and this depth of meaning enables the Biblical concepts to become alive in a world come of age.

The non-religious interpretation of Biblical concepts means that" the concepts must be interpreted in such a way as not to make religion a precondition of faith." Here we find the theological solution of the problem of non-religious interpretation. The relation of religious Christian faith has to be thought through in the light of the relation of law to Gospel. This is pointed out on another occasion when Bonhoeffer says that to confuse Christ with a particular stage in the ‘religiousness’ of man would be to confuse him with a human law. It is to be carefully noted that the introduction of the concepts of law does not imply the identification of religion and law. Direct identification of religion with law would rest on the mistaken notion that non-religiousness is lawlessness, which of course is not what Bonhoeffer means. Gerhard Ebeling clarifies this point in these words:

The introduction of the concept of law implies rather that the phenomenon of religion (and likewise that of non-religiousness!) has its place in theology within the problem of the law -- so much so, indeed, that on the basis of the concept religion the correct distinction of law and Gospel is quite out of the question, and thus the domination of the concept religion in theology can only lead to falsely turning the Gospel into law.

In other words we can say that religious interpretation is legalistic interpretation whereas non-religious interpretation means interpretation that distinguishes law and Gospel. Legalistic interpretation can neither be Christological interpretation nor interpretation of faith; on the other hand interpretation that distinguishes law and Gospel can be both Christological interpretation and interpretation of faith.

The question that confronts Bonhoeffer, and us too, is this: how do we preach Gospel to the non-religious man as freedom from the law without first laying down to him law that is strange to him and does not concern him? How is the law really brought home to the non-religious man? What is it that unconditionally concerns him? Whether our preaching of the Gospel is understandable and binding depends on whether our preaching of the law is understandable and binding. Bonhoeffer said:

> It is only when one loves life and the earth so much that without them everything seems to be over that one may believe in the resurrection and a new world; it is only when one submits to God’s law that one may speak of grace; and it is only when God’s wrath and vengeance are hanging as grim realities over the heads of one’s enemies that something of what it means to love and forgive them can touch our hearts. In my opinion it is not Christian to want to take our thoughts and feelings too quickly and too directly from the New Testament.... One cannot and must not speak the last word before the last but one. We live in the last but one and believe the last.\(^{35}\)

One might well question, at this point, the validity of nonreligious interpretation, asking whether Bonhoeffer has given us any example of non-religious interpretation rather than speaking only of its importance. Apparently Bonhoeffer has not left a definite answer to this question, except a handful of random thoughts. He even confessed that "I am only gradually working my way to the non-religious interpretation of Biblical concepts; the job is too big for me to finish just yet."\(^{36}\) Bonhoeffer gives us the "starting point" for a non-religious interpretation when he directs our view to the God of the Bible. A non-religious interpretation would call men to participate in the suffering of God in his life of the world," not in the first place thinking about one’s own needs, problems, sins and fears, but allowing oneself to be caught up into the way of Jesus Christ, into the messianic event, thus fulfilling Isa. 53."\(^{37}\) The problem of a non-religious interpretation is not merely a hermeneutical one, but involves the whole existence of the church itself. It is an interpretation that is not concerned with religion, but with life. It is by living in the midst of the world, by taking life in our stride, that "we throw ourselves completely into the arms of the God, taking seriously, not our own sufferings, but those of God in the world-watching with Christ in Gethsemane."\(^{38}\) Thus Bonhoeffer exhorts us to interpret the Biblical concepts in terms of responsible involvement in life itself.

One thing is quite clear from what Bonhoeffer says: the criterion for the understandability of our preaching should not be how well it is understood by the believer, but by the non-believer. For, though the proclaimed word seeks to effect faith, it does not pre-suppose faith as a prerequisite. Bonhoeffer’s complaint is that today the church has made the congregation’s belief, and thereby its faith, the requirement for its understanding of the preaching. "Believe what we tell you", the church seems to say, "have faith, and you will understand", failing to recognize that if her preaching is not understandable it can hardly elicit faith. The criterion of understandability is thus reversed. This results not only in making the proclamation as a foreign language to the non-believer, but also in stifling the faith of the believer. Thus we find, heralded in Bonhoeffer’s struggle with the question of non-religious interpretation, a rediscovery of what Christian faith really means. He believes that the Bible message, for its own part, ultimately demands a non-religious interpretation, because only such an interpretation is appropriate to it.

It has to be emphasized that Bonhoeffer’s non-religious interpretation does not cast aside the importance of prayer, sacraments etc. Defending Bonhoeffer’s position Eberhard Bethge says:

It would be a great mistake to understand Bonhoeffer as abolishing the worshipping church and replacing service and sacrament by acts of charity. The religionless world in itself is not Christianity. The church must not throw away its great terms ‘creation’, ‘fall’, ‘atonement’, ‘repentance’, ‘last things’ and soon. But if she cannot relate them to the secularized world in such a way that their essence in worldly life can immediately be seen, then the church had better keep silent. Bonhoeffer himself worshipped and acted vicariously in anonymity and silence, and it is precisely this which enables him to speak loudly now to worldly life.39

Again, it needs to be emphasized that Bonhoeffer’s reflections on non-religious interpretation presuppose the church’s task of proclamation. He speaks of the weakness of the church’s proclamation in these words:

Our church, which has been fighting in these years only for its self-preservation, as though that were an end in itself, is incapable of taking the word reconciliation and redemption to mankind and the world.40

Thus the church has sinned against its own nature. It has missed the mark in that "The church is the church only when it exists for others." His criticism of the church is an expression of his love for the church, and if we take these words in isolation they will form only a half-truth.

Bonhoeffer leaves the church utterly and completely to the mercy of that which makes the church its true self; therefore his theological thinking, too, is oriented towards that which makes the church its true self -- that is the word of God proclaimed. The church which lacks this foundation, Bonhoeffer says, is incapable of taking the word of reconciliation and redemption to humankind and the world. It is this same concern that we find in his challenge to the church:

The church must come out of its stagnation. We must move out again into the open air of intellectual discussion with the world, and risk saying controversial things, if we are to get down to the serious problems of life.

Marxist interpreters of Bonhoeffer assume that if Bonhoeffer’s call for non-religious interpretation is taken seriously, then there is not much left in Christianity except some social teaching. One can hardly agree with this exaggerated judgement. It is rather difficult to believe that Bonhoeffer would have reduced Christianity to some social teachings. On the contrary it was the desire of Bonhoeffer to present to the church a new vision in that he wanted the sacramental church to be also a social church without losing its spiritual foundation. For those who question the authenticity of Bonhoeffer’s faith during the prison days, the words of H. Fischer- Hullstrung, the camp doctor of the Flossemburg concentration camp, remain a genuine testimony. Describing the early morning hours of the day Bonhoeffer was executed, the doctor wrote:

Through the half open door in one room of the huts I saw Pastor Bonhoeffer, before taking off his prison grab, kneeling on the floor praying fervently to his God. I was most deeply moved by the way this lovable man prayed, so devout and so certain that God heard his prayer. At the place of execution, he again said a short prayer and then climbed the steps to the gallows, brave and composed. His death ensued after a few seconds. In the almost fifty years that I worked as a doctor, I have hardly ever seen a man die so entirely submissive to the will of God.

One who wants to present Christianity only as some social teachings would not engage in such devotional acts. Rather, what we find here is a supreme illustration of the faith of the one who said: "When Christ calls a man, he bids him come and die". Nevertheless, some of the Marxist interpreters are correct in their perceptive observation of finding in Bonhoeffer’s theology some possibilities for a constructive encounter between Marxism and Christianity.

Bonhoeffer developed his thinking with a firm belief in the Incarnation and the Cross, and consequently, in the potential of a renewed humanity. This belief led him to a wholehearted recognition of the world come of age, to a criticism of religion, and to an attempt to interpret Biblical and theological concepts in a non-religious language. As we found in the preceding chapter, and in the present one too, this process has a strong Christological foundation and it was the genius of Bonhoeffer that he tackled the problem of religion without for a moment losing sight of Christ. It was Bonhoeffer’s strong conviction, not only during the university days but also during the prison days, that from Christology alone the non-religious interpretation can receive an answer. Non-religious interpretation is not just an invitation to the self-sufficient world of Marx, but an exhortation to take responsibility of the reality of this world, the norm and standard of which is Jesus Christ himself. It presents to the church solid and dependable criteria for her preaching and true life in the world come of age. By means of non-religious interpretation he hoped to achieve renewal within the church, in her proclamation and in her formal structures. It is certain that with this new kind of interpretation he does not reject the idea of the church; but the way of life in the church which Bonhoeffer envisions is one of what he calls "Religionless Christianity."

Notes:

3. LPP,op.cit., pp.135(21 November 1943)

5. LPP, op.cit., p.283 f (5 May 1944).

6. LPP, op.cit., p.381 ("Outline for a Book").

7. LPP, op.cit., p.286 (5 May 1944).

12. LPP, op.cit., p.348 ("Christians and Pagans").

15. LPP, op.cit., pp. 280 f (30 April 1944).

16. LPP, op.cit., p.382f ("Outline for a Book").

19. LPP, op.cit., pp. 299f ("Thoughts on the Day of the Baptism of D.W.R. Bethge")

20. Ibid., p.300.

41. LPP, op. cit., p.382 ("Outline for a Book").

42. LPP, op. cit., p.378 (3 August 1944).

Bishop Paulose Mar Paulsoe prefers to call himself a "secular theologian" because he communicates the Christian faith in secular language. He received his Ph.D. from Princeton Theological Seminary for a dissertation on Bonhoeffer’s corrective of Karl Marx. He was a Bishop in the Chaldean Syrian Church in Kerala, India and served as President of the World Student Christian Federation. Published by Christava Sahitya Samithy (CSS), Tiruvalla-689 101, Kerala, S. India. This material was prepared for Religion Online by Ted and Winnie Brock.

Chapter 9: Religionless Christianity

The concept of Religionless Christianity has been one of the most controversial subjects in Bonhoeffer’s theology. Surprisingly, Bonhoeffer himself used the expression "religionless Christianity" only in the famous letter of April 30, 1944. Mention has already been made that Bonhoeffer’s theology, especially as it was developed in the prison letters, has been under vigorous criticism. It is disappointing to note that many critiques of Bonhoeffer see him only through the eyes of the so-called "radical theologians" who have misrepresented his thoughts. This is not a fair approach to his thinking. Bonhoeffer should have a hearing on his own merits. If we miss the dialectical nature of his theology we miss the whole point. Paul Lehmann, a good friend of Bonhoeffer during the pre-war days, has pointed out that,

The so-called "Death of God" theologians are perhaps the most conspicuous of Bonhoeffer’s misrepresentation. They have seized upon the Letters and Papers from Prison with such avid and hasty enthusiasm as to have provided an American parallel to those German enthusiasts who have, all but launched a "Bonhoeffer School". On the continent, "the world come of age", "religionless Christianity", "true worldliness" have tempted Bonhoeffer’s former pupils, now in theological faculties or church administration, towards cultic passions. In the United States, these same phrases have been appropriated as a kind of quintessential, "new essence of Christianity" which claims Bonhoeffer for the tradition of Nietzsche and celebrates him as a forerunner of a theology without God. It cannot be too strongly emphasized that both cultic and atheistic celebrations of Bonhoeffer are grievous distortions of his thought and spirit. When the prison papers are read and reflected upon, with due regard for Bonhoeffer’s exegetical and theological writings, there is no informed and responsible way claiming Bonhoeffer for a theology without God.¹

The death-of-God theology, in the narrowest possible sense of the term, points to the teachings of the American triumvirate -- Thomas Altizer, William Hamilton and Paul van Buren -- who stirred up quite a bit of public commotion and whose work is now almost of no value. These theologians consider Bonhoeffer as the thinker whose seminal thoughts have provided the basic inspiration for their own theological stand. In his book The New Essence of Christianity, Hamilton says that "My essay as a whole is deeply indebted to Bonhoeffer, and may be taken as a theological response to the coming of age of the world as he has analyzed it."² Hamilton and associates are surely interested in Bonhoeffer, but whether they understand him rightly is a different question. In any case, Bonhoeffer aficionados will not subscribe to the theory of making him the spiritus rector of the death-of-God theology. It is not our purpose here to interpret the death-of-God theologians but to examine, as briefly as possible, how their theology is basically different from that of Bonhoeffer.

The death-of-God theologians declare that God is dead. When they speak of the death of God they are not just referring to the God of the Greek metaphysics, or the inadequate imagery that has characterized Christian concepts to speak of God, or the false gods of pagan idolatry. They are speaking of the death of the Christian God Himself.

At this point we have to question whether these theologians are authentically ‘radical’. The term ‘radical’ (radix) actually means "pertaining to the roots" or "going to the foundation of something". A Christian theologian, if he is to be radical, should go back to the New Testament roots of Christianity. The death-of-God theologians are not at all radical in this sense, since their starting point would seem to be the rejection of biblical belief in the living, eternal God. They have carried certain tendencies in theology to their own conclusions, and it would be more appropriate to say that they are radicals in the jargon where that word means ‘extremist’. Whereas the thrust of Bonhoeffer’s theology is his Christocentric concept of reality, it would seem that these self-styled radicals are promoting some kind of "Jesus cult". The title The Christian Century gave to Hamilton’s review of van Buren’s The Secular Meaning of the Gospel: "There is no God and Jesus is His Son" rightly points out the paradoxical nature of this strange theology.³

In contrast to the death-of-God theologians, Bonhoeffer was a radical theologian, for the scripture was the basis of his theology. In Ethics Bonhoeffer said:

> In Jesus Christ we have faith in the incarnate, crucified and risen God. In the incarnation we learn of the love of God for His creation; in the crucifixion we learn of the judgment of God upon all flesh; and in the resurrection we learn of God’s will for a new world. There could be no greater error than to tear these three elements apart; for each of them comprises the whole.⁴

To interpret this fundamental message of the Gospel to the man come of age was the mission of Bonhoeffer. The expression "death of God" never appears in Bonhoeffer’s writings. He speaks, instead, of life "before God" in the world without the God-hypothesis and by means of the "secret discipline" (which Hamilton scarcely mentions and Altizer interprets as a need for silence). It is the ‘metaphysical’ God of religion, the deus ex machina, the "working hypothesis," that Bonhoeffer rejects.

According to Bonhoeffer, to believe in the God of Western theism is to rely upon a false image of God. Therefore he rejects this kind of God-hypothesis. He is very particular to make this rejection, because to him one of the most important aspects of a deeply worldly and committed life is a right theology of God and a clear withdrawal from the false religious outlook of the past. In one of the most significant of all his remarks Bonhoeffer said:

> ....we have to live in the world esti deus non daretur (even if there were no God) and this is just what we do recognize—before God. God himself compels us to recognize it. So our coming of age leads us to a true recognition of our situation before God. God would have us know that we must live as men who manage our lives without him. The God who is with us is the God who forsakes us (Mark. 15:34). The God who lets us live in the world without the working hypothesis of God is the God before whom we stand continually. Before God and with God we live without God.

There are important points to be noticed in this last statement. First, God is spoken of in conjunction with the "without God". Second, the intellectual honesty of modern man and the testimony of Christian faith meet in a unique way. This means that the world in its adulthood "is no really better understood than it understands itself, namely on the basis of the gospel and in the light of Christ." The meeting of the intellectual honesty of modern man and the testimony of Christian faith is a necessary theological conformation. The faith is a presupposition for the intellectual honesty; for maintaining one’s ‘adulthood’ and "standing fast", confronting reality with an intellectually honest view, is possible only "before God". It is evident, then, that Bonhoeffer had no intention of constructing a theology by eliminating the living God of the Bible after the manner of the death-of-God theologians. It would be more appropriate to say that while Altizer, Hamilton and van Buren were concerned about the "death of God", Bonhoeffer took the issue with religion.

It is important to realize that Bonhoeffer’s use of the term "religion" takes its origin from Karl Barth’s treatment of the subject. He was fully in sympathy with Barth’s endeavour to distinguish religion as a human activity from the authentic tidings of the true God. Bonhoeffer also accepted the view that religion as historical phenomenon was the fruit of human speculation.

Barth said that it is only the forgiving and reconciling presence of God in human religion that can give it reality, and that this is to be found only in Jesus Christ, the only mediator between God and human being. He tells us therefore that human religion has no worth nor truth in itself. Since a way has been opened up into the presence of God in and through Christ, all previous religions, or religions outside of Christ, are displaced and robbed of any claim to truth. Justification by grace reveals that religion can be the supreme form taken by human sin. This applies to Christian religion as well. Through sin and self-will the Christian religion may become merely a form of man’s cultural self-expression or be the means whereby man seeks to justify and sanctify himself before God. This is the basis of Barth’s attack upon nineteenth century religion and upon all self-centred, self-conscious pietistic religion.

Barth, however, does not deny the universality of religion. He emphasizes the need for charity and caution in the evaluation of religion. God speaks through the Christian faith not because of any superiority of Christian religion, but because of His grace. In contrast to revelation, which is God’s self-offering and self-manifestation, a religion is "a grasping which is not true reception". Barth writes:

If man tries to grasp at truth of himself, he tries to grasp at it a priori. But in that case he does not do what he has to do when the truth comes to him. He does not believe. If he did, he would listen; but in religion he takes something for himself. If he did, he would let God Himself intercede for God: but in religion he ventures to grasp at God.7

According to Barth, faith is the response to God’s revelation of Himself as Lord in Jesus Christ, a revelation in which the initiative rests firmly with God. If through religion man had been able to find God, this revelation would not have been necessary. The very fact of revelation proves religion to be inadequate, and now the whole field of religion must be looked at in the light of this fact. Barth also says that the theologian’s task is to try to discover what status of religion is from the point of faith.

Apart from faith religion becomes idolatry. In a typically lengthy footnote, Barth goes on to describe with great insight how religion is thought of as idolatry in the Bible. Religion is also unbelief because it is man’s attempt to find justification and sanctification for himself on his own terms. This is a self-centered way of erecting barriers against God. Our pious efforts to reconcile God to ourselves must certainly be abomination in His sight. Barth makes his position clear in this statement:

unbelief is always man’s faith in himself. And this faith invariably consists in the fact that man makes the mystery of his responsibility his own mystery, instead of accepting it as the mystery of God. It is this faith which is religion. It is contradicted by the revelation attested in the New Testament, which is identical with Jesus Christ as the one who acts for us and on us. This stamps religion as unbelief.

Barth again and again emphasizes that the church exists as the church not insofar as it possesses some inalienable human form but only as it lives by divine grace. Whenever it tries to create an animating principle of its own, the church ceases to be the church of Jesus Christ and becomes an organ of that religion which is the enemy of faith.

Now we turn to Bonhoeffer. He starts, like Barth, from the fundamental principle of justification of the sinner by grace alone. This justification removes from us all false props, all reliance upon external authorities, and all refuge in worldly securities, and throws us not upon ourselves but upon the pure gracious act of God in His unconditional love, so that the ethical and religious life are lived exclusively with Jesus Christ as the centre.

Bonhoeffer, however, differs from Barth when the issue of the religious a priori becomes more pointed. Barth acknowledges man’s research for God from below as the height of human endeavours. Although man’s reaching out to God, in religion or in philosophy, will not be successful, it still has its place in human achievements. Barth does not deny that man has an inherent tendency for religion. Religion is one rooted in his divine origin in that:

The religious relationship of man to God which is the inevitable consequence of his sin is a degenerate form of covenant relationship, the relationship between the Creator and the creature. It is the empty and deeply problematical shell of that relationship. But as such it is a confirmation that relationship has not been destroyed by God, that God will not be mocked, that even forgetful man will not be able to forget Him.

In the midst of all his criticism of religion, Barth still finds religion as an inescapable element in human consciousness. There is an a priori element behind the manifold expression of religion in human history. Barth agrees that this a priori element is not important when it comes to the validity and justification of religion. But Bonhoeffer goes a step further. He denies the religious a priori completely, and it is here that he opens up a new dimension beyond Barth’s theology. In contrast to Barth’s exclusive emphasis upon revelation, Bonhoeffer brings faith and obedience into focus as the correlatives of revelation. Thus he is able to speak existentially where Barth spoke exclusively in terms of revelation. It is this focus on faith and obedience that enables Bonhoeffer to reject totally that ‘religion’ which Barth mildly distinguishes from revelation.

Faith and obedience thus emerge as the important existential motifs of Bonhoeffer’s theology, especially in The Cost of Discipleship. By bringing close to faith such a concept as discipleship Bonhoeffer stresses the human side of the event of revelation:

> From the point of view of justification it is necessary ... to separate them [faith and obedience], but we must never lose sight of their essential unity. For faith is only real when there is obedience, never without it, and faith only becomes faith in the act of obedience.\(^\text{10}\)

We cannot make a chronological distinction between faith and obedience, nor determine which is the logical consequence of the other. It is evident from this that Bonhoeffer never denies the theological primacy of the revelation.

Faith for Bonhoeffer is not a priori, not something always there in man waiting to be discovered: "Faith itself must be created in him."\(^\text{11}\) Just as revelation is an event in time and in a concrete situation, faith also is an event that takes place at the critical moment of man’s decision. It is true that God’s call gives rise to faith, but faith never occurs without man’s being responsible for it. Just as revelation is contingent upon God’s will, faith is also contingent upon man’s responsible decision in response to the call.

This is the reason, Bonhoeffer says, that religionlessness is hopeful. For Bonhoeffer the affirmation of faith is the negation of religion. Freedom from religion liberates faith to be attentive to the call of God; freedom of faith is the freedom received of God. Quoting Barth, Bonhoeffer effectively asserts that "... the relationship between God and man in which God’s revelation may truly be imparted to me, a man, must be free, not a static relationship..."\(^\text{12}\) Faith is thus rooted in God’s freedom.

Faith addresses persons with an eye to their humanity and has no other aim than that they should be really human. Being a Christian does not add anything to being a human being, but puts our humanity into force.
"The Christian is not a homo religious, but simply a man, as Jesus was a man. The basis of faith is "enduring reality before God." Thus defined faith is concrete and finds worldliness at once both a necessity and a gift.

(Man) must live a ‘secular’ life, and thereby share in God’s sufferings. He may live a ‘secular’ life (as one who has been freed from false religious obligations and inhibitions). To be a Christian does not mean to be religious in a particular way, to make something of oneself (a sinner, a penitent or a saint) on the basis of some methods or other, but to be a man not a type of man, but the man that Christ creates in us.13

This is a new thought in Bonhoeffer, whereas he had earlier thought that one can acquire faith by trying to lead some sort of holy life. The following lengthy quote illustrates the point.

I remember a conversation I had in America thirteen years ago with a young French pastor. We were asking ourselves quite simply what we wanted to do with our lives. He said he would like to become a saint (and I think it’s quite likely that he did become one). At the time I was very impressed, but I should like to learn to have faith. For a long time I didn’t realize the depth of the contrast. I thought I could acquire faith by trying to live a holy life, or something like it... I discovered later, and I’m still discovering right up to this moment, that it is only by living completely in this world that one learns to have faith. One must completely abandon any attempt to make something of oneself, whether it be a saint, or a converted sinner, or a churchman (a so-called priestly type!), a righteous man or an unrighteous one, a sick man or a healthy one. By this- worldliness I mean living unreservedly in life’s duties, problems, successes and failures, experiences and perplexities. In so doing we throw ourselves completely into the arms of God, taking seriously, not our own sufferings, but those of God in the world- watching with Christ in Gethsemane. That, I think, is faith; that is metanoia; and that is how one becomes a man and a Christian.14
Thus the enduring of reality makes one a "whole man"-- not "man on his own", but "man existing for others". Bonhoeffer’s main contention is a triumphant assertion that faith works through love to free the Christian for action in the real world. The man of faith is released from self-preoccupation, on the religious level; as well as on other levels, to identify with his neighbour in the day-to-day affairs of the world, the place in which he knows God and enjoys life.

If Bonhoeffer were merely formulating this concept of faith on the basis of premises derived from cultural-historical analysis, he would be indistinguishable from many liberal theologians. For the weaknesses of liberal theology was that it conceded to the world the right to determine Christ’s place in the world; in the conflict between the church and the world it accepted the comparatively easy terms of peace that the world dictated.

Thus it was Bonhoeffer’s conception of faith that enabled and compelled him to take his stand against religion. He was convinced that theology has a message to the world only when it proclaims, from the perspective of faith, the maturity of the world and the religionlessness of man. The world may certainly grow mature, but "the world must be understood better that it understands itself." Bonhoeffer’s critique of religion is actually a call to maturity and religionlessness addressed to the contemporary man.

Bonhoeffer’s prison letters reveal three themes which are very close to him and which provides a glimpse of what he meant by ‘religionless Christianity”. These themes are "Holy Worldliness", "Theology of Responsibility" and "Secret Discipline". We have already touched on these themes, but now we shall examine them more closely as Bonhoeffer develops them as guidelines for the life style of the "religionless Christian" who believes, in contrast to Marx, that his humanity becomes meaningful only in obedience to his Lord.

1. Holy Worldliness. For Bonhoeffer, holy worldliness is the only genuine form of holiness possible for the contemporary Christian -- anything else is an illusion. He means by this a complete dedication to life, a commitment to one’s own potential and to the needs of the world. The idea of holy worldliness can be found early in his thought, in Ethics, where we find the theological presupposition of this concept.

That God loved the world and reconciled it with Himself in Christ is the central message proclaimed in the New Testament. It is assumed there that the world stands in need of reconciliation with God but that it is not capable of achieving it by itself. The acceptance of the world by God is a miracle of the divine compassion.

In the body of Jesus Christ God took upon himself the sin of the whole world and bore it. There is no part of the world, be it never so forlorn and never so godless, which is not accepted by God and reconciled with God in Jesus Christ. Whoever sets eyes on the body of Jesus Christ in faith can never again speak of the world as though it were lost, as though it were separated from Christ; he can never again with clerical arrogance set himself apart from the world. The world belongs to Christ, and it is only in Christ that the world is what it is.16

In the prison writings we find Bonhoeffer’s insistence upon "a full life", the severe criticism of fellow prisoners who "miss the fullness of life and the wholeness of an independent existence", and a constant return to the theme of involvement in the world -- these give some indication of the direction in which Bonhoeffer’s thoughts move. Dag Hammarskjold Wrote: "In our era, that road to holiness necessarily passes through the world of action."17 This is precisely what Bonhoeffer means by the term "holy worldliness". He believed that the ability to move freely, amiably, and intensely in the present can only come of a commitment to the future and to the eternal He described this commitment in the "Stations on the Road to Freedom:

Faint not fear, but go out to the storm and the action, trusting in God whose commandment you faithfully follow; freedom, exultant, will welcome your spirit with joy.18

Again, in the book he intended to write, the final chapter was to begin:

The church is the church only when it exists for others. To make a start, it should give away all its property to those in need. The clergy must live solely on the freewill offerings of their congregations, or possibly engage in some secular calling. The church must share in the secular problems of ordinary human life, not dominating but helping and serving. It must tell men of every calling what it means to live in Christ, to exist for others.\(^{19}\)

Bonhoeffer never equates holy worldliness with any virtue, but with a mind and soul open wide to the world’s affairs. Within his notion of holy worldliness, he suggests three qualities which describe the Christian’s relationship to God: knowing God in the blessings He sends us; relating to God in strength, and not in weakness; and sharing with God in His suffering in the world. He considers each of these qualities as important characteristics of the Christian, living a holy life before God in the world.

The first quality is that of knowing God in the blessings He sends us. Bonhoeffer says, "The intermediate theological category between God and human fortune is, as far as I can see, that of blessing."\(^ {20}\) God’s blessing, whether it be health, fortune, or vigour, forms a central concern in the Old Testament and in the New Testament. Our response to God’s blessing is central and crucial: "I believe that we ought so to love and trust God in our lives, and in all the good things that he sends us, that when the time comes (but not before!) we may go to him with love, trust, and joy."\(^ {21}\)

The second quality which Bonhoeffer describes and to which he summons us is that of strength. "I should like to speak of God not on the boundaries but at the centre, not in weaknesses but in strength; and therefore not in death and guilt but in man’s life and goodness."\(^ {22}\) God’s blessing may well be the source of this strength, but it is man’s responsibility to nurture and develop it. On another occasion Bonhoeffer remarks that according to St. Paul, God not only wishes us to be ‘good’, He wishes us also to be strong. Speaking of his cellmate in prison, who used to laugh at others for whining while he himself moaned, Bonhoeffer says:

> I told him in no uncertain terms what I thought of people who can be very hard on others and talk big about a dangerous life and so on, and then collapse under the slightest test of endurance. I told him that it was a downright disgrace, that I had no sympathy at all with anyone like that.\(^ {23}\)
The third quality is that of sharing with God in His suffering in the world. Although God wishes human beings love God from the centre of their lives, in their joys and blessings, it is also true that God wishes people to remain faithful in suffering. Of this quality Bonhoeffer wrote:

Not only action, but also suffering is a way to freedom. In suffering, the deliverance consists in our being allowed to put the matter out of our own hands into God’s hands. In this sense death is the crowning of human freedom. Whether the human deed is a matter of faith or not depends on whether we understand our sufferings as an extension of our action and a completion of freedom.\(^{24}\)

Bonhoeffer very often uses the phrase "participating in the suffering of God in the world". From the poem "Christians and Pagans" we get clue of what he means:

Men go to God when he is sore bested,
Find him poor and scorned,
Without shelter or bread,
Whelmèd under weight of the wicked, the weak, the dead;
Christians stand by God in his hour of grieving.\(^{25}\)

This concept of "participating in the suffering of God in the world" is rooted in Bonhoeffer’s Christology. Christ did not come in glory and lay claim to a worldly throne. He was born in a stable and died on a cross. For Bonhoeffer it was the suffering and powerlessness of Christ that made God real for him. One can speculate that the whole prison experience was instrumental in making vivid for Bonhoeffer this dimension of the Biblical faith. In that context it was meaningless to think of the ‘religious’ God who solved the unsolved problems. What was meaningful was faith in the God revealed in Christ who was suffering with him in the world. He identifies Christian suffering with his most intense participation in God’s life:

Christians stand by God in his hour of grieving; that is what distinguishes Christians from pagans. Jesus asked in Gethsemane, ‘Could you not watch with me one hour?’ That is a reversal of what the religious man expects from God. Man is summoned to share in God’s suffering at the hands of a godless world.\(^{26}\)
The radical identification of our suffering, the intense life of this world, with participation in Christ marks a major tenet of Bonhoeffer’s notion of holy worldliness.

2. Theology of Responsibility. Bonhoeffer had already dealt with this theme in an academic way in his Ethics, where he spoke of the structure and pattern of responsibility. Like all of Bonhoeffer’s themes, responsibility has a Christological foundation. It is grounded in Jesus Christ’s being as being-for-others. It has its foundation "in the responsibility of Jesus Christ for men, on the basis of our knowledge that the origin, essence and goal of all reality is the real, that is to say, God in Jesus Christ." For Bonhoeffer, responsibility is a response to "the reality which is given to us in Jesus Christ." As early as in the doctoral dissertation he asserts that man is not man in and by himself but only in responsibility to and for another.

Thus, Bonhoeffer defines responsibility as "the total and realistic response of man to claim of God and of our neighbour."27

It is rather difficult to find an actual definition of responsibility in the prison letters. However, the importance Bonhoeffer placed on responsible action in a Christian’s life may be recognized in the following passage:

We will not and must not be either outraged critics or opportunists, but must take our share of responsibility for the moulding of history in every situation and at every moment, whether we are the victors or the vanquished. One who will not allow any occurrence whatever to deprive him of responsibility for the course of history -- because he knows that it has been laid on him by God -- will thereafter achieve a more fruitful relation to the events of history than that of barren criticism and equally barren opportunism. To talk of going down fighting like heroes in the face of certain defeat is not really heroic at all, but merely a refusal to face the future. The ultimate question for a responsible man to ask is not how he is to extricate himself heroically from the affair, but how the coming generation is to live.28

On several occasions Bonhoeffer equates the whole or conformed man with responsible man. In the Baptismal sermon he wrote:
For your thought and action will enter on a new relationship; your thinking will be confined to your responsibilities in action. With us, thought was often the luxury of the onlooker, with you it will be entirely subordinated to action. "Not every one who says to me ‘Lord’, shall enter the kingdom of heaven, but he who does the will of my Father who is in heaven", said Jesus (Matt. 7:21).

Like holy worldliness, responsibility characterizes the Christian church which has torn out its religious roots.

Bonhoeffer interprets reality by means of his theology of responsibility. Bonhoeffer would agree with Marx in saying that the real is the place of one’s responsibility -- there is no other place. Apart from the intervention of responsibility, the real is mere illusion: "... action comes, not from thought, but from a readiness for responsibility." To be responsible means to answer to someone for something. But, in contrast to Marx, for Bonhoeffer this means answering to God for the real. The place for one’s responsibility is precisely the place where one is ontologically rooted in the real. And yet, one’s responsibility for the real is not to the real itself, as Marx would have it, but to God in one’s personal relation to Him.

Bonhoeffer believes that only by being responsible to God can we be responsible for the real in all its profundity and fullness. He would agree with Marx that to be responsible to God without at the same time being responsible for the real means alienation. But at the same time he corrects Marx when he says that the real is not self-explanatory -- Jesus Christ is the reality. Without conforming to that reality, responsibility is a Sisyphean endeavour.

3. Secret Discipline: Bethge has pointed out that though the phrase "secret discipline" occurs only twice in the prison letters, it was not as peripheral for Bonhoeffer as the infrequency of the phrase might suggest. It will be appropriate to say that as a means of describing holy worldliness and responsible action, Bonhoeffer chose the unusual phrase "secret discipline". It appears for the first time in the famous letter of April 30, 1944:
Christ is no longer an object of religion, but something quite different, really the Lord of the world. But what does that mean? What is the place of worship and prayer in a religionless situation? Does secret discipline Arkandisziplin, or alternatively the difference..., between penultimate and ultimate, take on a new importance here?\(^{30}\)

Then, following his criticism of Barth’s positivistic doctrine of revelation, Bonhoeffer says:

There are degrees of knowledge and degrees of significance; that means that a secret discipline Arkandisziplin must be restored whereby the mysteries of the Christian faith are protected against profanation.\(^{31}\)

In contrast to the visible, worldly life of the Christian in the realm of the "things before last" (penultimate), there must be a hidden, disciplined life of devotion and prayer that is grounded in the belief on the "last things" (ultimate). These form the dialectical poles of Christian existence -- the worldly life always requiring the nourishment of the secret discipline and the secret discipline always sending a man back into the world. Thus the identification of the Christian with the world is not at all to be associated with the loss of his identity. The dialectic between the identity and identification of the Christian is the underlining thought behind the phrase "secret discipline". As Bethge put it, "If... non-religious interpretation means identification (with the world), then arcane discipline is the guarantee of an identity".\(^{32}\)

The profound meaning implied in the phrase "secret discipline" can be better understood in the light of The Cost of Discipleship. The book may sound as if it emphasizes the Christian’s separation from the world; but it never leads to the point of any lack of responsibility to it. As we make a survey of the whole book we find two major tensions which can be considered as an interpretation of the term "secret discipline."

The first tension is that of the problem of the Christian in the world. There are statements which show a negative approach to the world:

The world is growing too small for the Christian community, and all it looks for is the Lord’s return. It still walks in the flesh, but with eyes upturned to heaven, whence he for whom they wait will come again.

At the same time there are also statements like, "The only way to follow Jesus was by living in the world." The Christian has to lead the life in terms of his secular calling; an idea Bonhoeffer takes from Luther’s notion of vocation. Envisaging the confusion this tension might create, Bonhoeffer gives an interpretation to it:

We must face up to the truth that the call of Christ does set up a barrier between man and his natural life. But this barrier is no surely contempt for life, no legalistic piety, it is the life which is life indeed, the gospel, the person of Jesus Christ.

The second tension is the inherent conflict of the hidden yet visible character of Christian life. Jesus Christ said: "Let your light so shine before men." (Mt. 5:16) In the following chapter we read: "Go into your room and shut the door and pray to your father who is in secret." (Mt. 6:6) Here also Bonhoeffer offers his interpretation:

Our activity must be visible, but never be done for the sake of making it visible... That which is visible must also be hidden. The awareness on which Jesus insists is intended to prevent us from reflecting on our extraordinary position. We have to take heed that we do not take heed of our own righteousness. Otherwise the ‘extraordinary’ which we achieve will not be that which comes from following Christ, but that which springs from our own will and desire.

Secret discipline does not divide life into compartments, either metaphysical or inward. It maintains relationship with God while disengaging mankind from the falsely supernatural character that often marks such a relationship. Secret discipline is not just a diplomatic strategy to deal with the world come of age, but a costly discipline. Its ultimate assurance is that in Jesus Christ on the cross, God and reality form a unity that is indivisible. As Andrew Dumas points out,

The secret discipline is... a reminder that man following after Christ is subject to the whole of reality, and cannot be content with only a portion of the world around him that has become tolerable and manipulable under his direction. To have come of age, to be religionless, implies this secret discipline of struggle, which for the Christian is the very secret that God shares with man.36

Those who attack Bonhoeffer criticizing that his faith was perverted during his last days should remember these words which reflect his secret discipline:

...even if we are prevented from clarifying our minds by talking things over, we can still pray, and it is only in the spirit of prayer that any such work (intellectual discussion with the world and risk saying controversial things) can be begun and carried through.37

The importance Bonhoeffer placed on worship and prayer can be better understood in the context of the first instance where he speaks of the secret discipline. There he asks the question: "What is the place of worship and prayer in a religionless situation?" The question may sound paradoxical, for we consider worship and prayer the most important activities that distinguishes a religious person from a non-religious one. Here we have to remember one criticism Bonhoeffer makes on religion. He says religion relates to one department of life only, one which is in contrast to the world. It is a particular area of experience or activity into which a man may turn aside. It is this assumption against which Bonhoeffer poses the question. However, this does not mean that Bonhoeffer does not want any one to go to church or to say prayers. He wrote from prison:

I have often found it a great help to think in the evening of all those who I know are praying for me, children as well as grown-ups. I think I owe it to the prayers of others, both known and unknown, that I have often been kept in safety.38

J.A.T. Robinson summarizes Bonhoeffer’s thoughts on this question with these words:

The purpose of worship is not to retire from the secular into the department of the religious, let alone to escape from "this world" into "the other world" but to open oneself to the meeting of the Christ in the common, to that which has power to penetrate its superficiality and redeem it from its alienation. The function of worship is to make us more sensitive to these depths; to focus, sharpen and deepen our response to the world and to other people beyond the point of proximate concern (of liking, self-interest, limited commitment, etc.) to that of ultimate concern; to purify and correct our loves in the light of Christ’s love; and in him to find the grace and power to be the reconciled and reconciling community. Anything that achieves this or assists towards it is Christian worship. Anything that fails to do this is not Christian worship, be it ever so ‘religious’. 39

It was acts of devotion that pushed Bonhoeffer into the world. He was a worldly man, but radically Biblical about his worldliness. Bonhoeffer was right in his assessment of the direction in which a Christian must move. Unless a Christian has the secret discipline as a presupposition of holy worldliness and responsible action, any distinction between being in the world and being of the world disappears.

How is the coming generation to live? Bonhoeffer’s critique of religion and the search for a new pattern of Christianity arise from this question. The phrase "religionless Christianity," which Bonhoeffer uses with much caution, may sound misleading. But, as it was said earlier, Bonhoeffer does not reject the idea of the church. He finds value in the church, but at the same time calls for a radical reform. In other words, the concept of religionless Christianity is to be taken as a challenge to the renewal of the church, a challenge found again and again in Bonhoeffer’s last writings. In this regard, he has not moved far from the position he had taken in Sanctorum Communio. For him, religionless Christianity was not just a field of theological exploration, but the concern of his lifelong efforts. He put this concept before the church as a challenge that the church enter into the world with more vigour than she ever has before. We shall conclude the discussion of religionless Christianity with these words of John A. Phillips, which echo the challenge of Bonhoeffer:

"Religionless Christianity"... is Christianity which has had the proper meaning of transcendence and witness to the Transcendent restored to it. It does not turn man back upon his life in the world and his face towards God, but rather directs him towards God and the world at one and the same time. God, the Transcendent, is active in this world. Therefore the Christian can and may and must live in this world and, by doing so, bear witness God in this world.40

Notes:

5. LPP, op. cit., p. 360 (16 July 1944).

8. Ibid., p. 314.

12. Ibid., p. 81.

14. LPP, op. cit., p. 369f (July 1944). It is quite conceivable that in this passage Bonhoeffer has in mind Marx’s statement: (It is easy to be a saint if one does not wish to be a man).

18. LPP, op. cit., p. 371 (‘Stations on the Road to Freedom’)

19. LPP, op. cit., p. 382 f ("Outline for a Book")

23. LPP, op. cit., 204f (2 February 1944).

25. LPP, op. cit., p. 348f ("Christians and Pagans")

28. LPP, op. cit., p. 7 ("After Ten Years").

34. Ibid., p. 106.

Chapter 10: Transcendence According To Bonhoeffer

Earlier we found that the primary aim of Marx’s critique of religion and his atheistic position was the realization of the positive factor of transcendence. Marx maintained that in religion the content of transcendence is God, and the transcendent future is the power of God which comes to humanity and evokes a response. But Marx denied any sort of transcendence beyond the human. He was reluctant to identify transcendence with God because he understood the absoluteness of God to function as a limit, a restraint upon the otherwise unlimited field of human possibilities.

Marx held the view that dependence on a transcendent God and full human autonomy are incompatible. In contrast to religious understanding of transcendence, Marx asserted that human beings shape the universe and their own destiny, and human being is not any more the object of history but its subject and agent. The future to which people are moving is completely open to them. It is this possibility which enables the human being to move towards the future along an original road that entails freedom and choice that Marx calls transcendence.

The problem of transcendence has been one of the most critical issues in Christian theology. Traditionally transcendence and immanence have been viewed diametrically opposed to each other, perhaps with an undue emphasis on their incompatibility. The former was taken to express God’s otherness and distinctness from man, the latter his presence with and freedom for man. One of the rather obvious and unfortunate features of the history of theology has been the tendency to go to extremes in stressing either the immanence of God at the expense of His transcendence, or vice versa. If the nineteenth century liberal theologians concentrated on immanence, the neo-orthodox theologians of twentieth century so stressed God’s sovereign transcendence that any sense of His presence in the world was almost lost.

The interest in understanding and interpreting transcendence is found not only among Marxist philosophers and Christian theologians, but also in other intellectual communities. Culture analysts, psychologists, sociologists and others who probe the content and the dimension of human society have worked diligently to define the concept of transcendence. According to them, transcendence aims at total life fulfillment. They acknowledge that human life is not all that it can be, and they attempt to devise ways to bring about total human fulfillment, using the categories appropriate to their particular scientific discipline. Transcendence means therefore the concrete resolution of social, economic and political problems as well as spiritual and psychic wholeness. Thus the desire for wholeness is understood as a basic human characteristic.

Whatever may be the definition of transcendence given by these secular thinkers, the objective is the same: to bring into being that which the human condition demands, i.e., the perfection of being. And it is more or less the same objective which contemporary theologians intend with their affirmations about the being of God and the nature of His activity in human history. When contemporary theologians speak of transcendence, their language is very much analogous to that of the humanists and other secular thinkers referred to -- though it is not quite the same. They approach the problem of transcendence in various ways: to reform the doctrine of God, to announce His death, to reduce theology to anthropology, or even to accept a pluralism of theistic and non-theistic beliefs in the church.

Generally speaking, the quest for the understanding of transcendence demonstrates that the critical issue for theologians is not to attempt a description of the nature and being of God but instead to attempt an exposition of the consequence of God’s activity in human history. In other words, when theologians affirm faith in the transcendent God of the scripture, they are affirming faith in the God who has acted in human history to make human beings whole and redeem them from their sins. Transcendence is not just the description of the inner metaphysical being of God. Rather it refers to an event, that historical event witnessed to in the scriptures, which brings about the restoration of health, i.e., reconciliation, to humanity. As William Johnson suggests, "transcendence has little to do with the nature and attributes of God but has everything to do with the consequence of God’s activity in history, that is, to introduce a transcendent dimension to human life." ¹

Having looked at the understanding of transcendence in the thoughts of secular thinkers and contemporary theologians, we shall now examine Bonhoeffer’s own treatment of the subject. For Bonhoeffer, the perfection of being is achieved through the transformation of human life by the redemptive activity of the transcendent God, who identified himself with human beings in order to effect wholeness. He offers a view of transcendence which is not identical with a particular metaphysic, but which leaves the human being in free play within the reality of his historical existence. It is crucial to his thinking that the unbridgeable gap between the transcendent God and the created order is bridged by the incarnation. Neither announcing the death of God nor reducing theology to anthropology, Bonhoeffer is trying to protect a very specific and concrete understanding of the incarnation from either dualism or immanentism, so that Christ may be known as the present Christ who assures God’s presence to reality and reality’s presence before God. He interprets transcendence in terms of human sociality. For Bonhoeffer, the other human being, as an ethical subject in community, is the form of both the otherness and the presence of God. The Christian God is He who is other in His being -- for and being -- with man.

Andre Dumas has pointed out that "transcendence runs the risk of excelling God outside of reality, and of debasing the worth of creation as a second-rate imitation of the true realm of essences."² By the use of the concept of "this-worldly transcendence" Bonhoeffer avoids this risk. He speaks of God not above reality, but at the point of hidden presence in reality. The incarnation is in one place where the Christian can understand God’s transcendence. As a result transcendence does not create a division between earthly appearances and heavenly essences.
Bonhoeffer reformulated the concept of transcendence in such a way that he rejected the doctrine of God popularly associated with much of the history of theology. He replaced it with an understanding of transcendence which is focused upon the humanity of Christ and the participation of the disciple, through Him, in the life of the world come of age. Bonhoeffer, thus, responds to Marx that faith in the transcendent God is not a fleeing away from the affairs of this world, on the contrary it is taking full responsibility of the reality of this world.

We shall now see how Bonhoeffer spoke of the transcendence of God as he expounded in his Christology. According to Bonhoeffer, Christology is utterly concrete in its orientation. In Christ the Centre Bonhoeffer asserts that > God in timeless eternity is not God, Jesus limited by time is not Jesus. Rather, God is God in the man Jesus. In this Jesus Christ God is present. This one God-man is the starting point of Christology.

For Bonhoeffer, Christology is a doctrine of God as well as of the humanity of Jesus, for Jesus Christ is God present in the humanity of Jesus. He expresses the difference between transcendence and immanence in terms of the two questions he introduces in his Christology lectures:

> The question Who? is the question of transcendence. The question How? is the question of immanence. Because the one who is questioned here is the Son, the immanent question cannot grasp him. The question of transcendence is the question of existence and the question of existence is the question of transcendence. In theological terms: man only knows who he is in the light of God.

Traditionally Christology has wrongly phrased the question of the incarnation as the question of how to bring together an eternal, infinite God and the temporal, finite man Jesus. With Bonhoeffer’s concrete biblical-theological question Who?

> ..... the whole problem of Christology is shifted. For here the point at issue is not the relationship of an isolated God to an isolated man in Christ, but the relationship of the already given God-man to the likeness of man. This God-man Jesus Christ is present and contemporaneous in the form of the ‘likeness’, i.e., in veiled form, as a stumbling block (scandalon).

When we restrict ourselves to the biblical-theological question Who? and look only to the scripture for the answer we discover that:

Christ is Christ not as Christ in himself, but in his relation to me. His being Christ is his being pro me. This being pro me is in turn not meant to be understood as an effect which emanates from him, or as an accident; it is meant to be understood as the essence, as the being of the person himself.

Here we have the essence of Bonhoeffer’s Christology that the very being of Christ is his being-for-man, in the community. This passage is highly significant, for here we find a Christological idea which is similar to the ‘religionless’ Christology of the prison letters: the very being of Christ is his ”being there for other”.

"A Christology which does not put at the beginning the statement, ‘God is only pro me, Christ is only Christ pro me’, condemns itself." Here Bonhoeffer refers to the essential unity of the act and being in God and in Christ. If God were not pro me He would not have acted in terms of revelation and made Himself known to us in Jesus Christ. If Jesus Christ were not pro me He would not be God incarnate. This means that Christ cannot be thought in isolation, as a Christ in Himself, but only in his relation to us, because the purpose of God’s humbling Himself in Christ was to have this relation to us, to be pro me. This does not, however, mean that God and Christ depend for their existence on me. Bonhoeffer makes it clear when he says that Christ is both ”the one who has really bound himself to me in free existence”, and ”the one who has freely preserved his contingency in his ‘being-there for you’."

In Bonhoeffer’s Christology lectures, one point clearly stands out: only a person can be authentically transcendent. Transcendence, thus, is a personal-ethical, concept. This emphasis on the personal ethical aspect of transcendence is not new in Bonhoeffer’s thinking. From the very beginning of his theological career, Bonhoeffer interpreted transcendence in socio-ethical terms. His notion of transcendence, together with the concept of person, was introduced for the first time in ...the concepts of person, community and God have an essential and indissoluble relation to one another. It is in relation to persons and personal community that the concept of God is formed. In principle, the nature of the Christian concept of community can be reached as well from the concept of God as from the concept of person.9

The question "Who is Christ for us today?" which we find in the prison letters can be traced back to earlier statements of Bonhoeffer.

In an article written while he was in the United States, Bonhoeffer spoke of Christ as "the personal revelation, the personal presence of God in the world".10 Again, in the same article, he brought together the three important conceptions --person, transcendence and God:

The transcendence of God does not mean anything else than that God is personality, provided there is an adequate understanding of the concept of personality... For Christian thought, personality is the last limit of thinking and the ultimate reality. Only personality can limit me, because the other personality has its own demands and claims, its own law and will, which are different from mine and which I cannot overcome as such. Personality is free and does not enter the general laws of my thinking. God as the absolutely free personality is therefore absolutely transcendent... Where can I find his inaccessible reality which is so entirely hidden from my thinking? How do I know about his being the absolutely transcendent personality? The answer is given and must be given by God himself, in his own word in Jesus Christ, for no one can answer this question except God himself, in his self-revelation in history, since none can speak the truth except God.11

In the prison writings Bonhoeffer interpreted God’s transcendence in concrete, social, ethical, I-Thou terms. He believed that whatever is to be said of God’s transcendence is what we can say of the biblical Christ. This man provides us with a norm which is concrete and ethical. In Ethics, Bonhoeffer says that it is to Christ, and Christ alone, that we look to see God. Any apprehension of the ‘beyond’ of God is an apprehension of the ‘beyond’ which we see manifested in the man Jesus. Christ means that God is to be found in the midst of the world and nowhere else.

Because Bonhoeffer understands the world only in the light of its reconciliation in Christ he can speak only of a "this-worldly transcendence". "It is now essential to the real concept of the secular that it shall always be seen in the movement of being accepted and becoming accepted by God in Christ."12 The transcendence of God is to be understood by Bonhoeffer’s lifelong and characteristic metaphor "God at the centre of life". The ‘beyond’ of God is not only God-in-the world revealed in Jesus; it is God-and-the-world reconciled in Jesus. In Christ we not only see God in the center of life; we also see God as the reconciler of life. Divine transcendence is revealed in Christ, and it is revealed as reconciliation. The "beyond" of God is reconciliation at the centre of life. Bonhoeffer again says: "I should like to speak of God not on the boundaries but at the centre, not in weaknesses but in strength; and therefore not in death and guilt but in man’s life and goodness."13 The God of the Bible encounters human being in the midst of worldly activities, at the strongest point. Bonhoeffer, thus, brought to his "non-religious" project a resolutely non-metaphysical notion of divine transcendence.

God’s transcendence in the realm of knowledge is the beyond in what man knows, not the stopgap in what he does not know. Bonhoeffer emphasizes this strongly when he speaks of Christ that "he certainly didn’t ‘come’ to answer our unsolved problems".14 The ‘beyond’ of God is not to be understood as metaphysical transcendence. The God who is to be understood in the man Jesus is "at the centre of life".

Bonhoeffer’s attempt to interpret the transcendence of God in a non-religious’ way reaches its climax in his "Outline for a Book". There he asks the question, "Who is God?" and answers,

Encounter with Jesus Christ. The experience that a transformation of all human life is given in the fact that "Jesus is there only for others". His "being there for others" is the experience of transcendence.15

All that we know of God is the "being there for others" which characterizes the Jesus of the Gospels. This "non-religious" concept of Jesus as "the man for others" is certainly not a humanist or ethical reductionism. Rather, it is an interpretation of God’s transcendence in terms of the proclamation that Jesus is the Christ. In other words, the transcendent is met in the concern for others as given to us in the life and way of Jesus. This new understanding of transcendence has serious implications to our faith. God is not to be found in an abstract belief about His omnipotence, omniscience, and omnipresence. Feuerbach and Marx criticized that God is a projection of man’s ideals. As long as we place some abstract ideas in place of God their criticism holds true. God is not the idea we have of Him. Rather, we find the ground of God’s omnipotence, omniscience, and omnipresence in Jesus’ "being there for others".

Faith, Bonhoeffer says, is participation in Jesus’ freedom to be for others. For Bonhoeffer, freedom is the distinctive characteristic of Christian life. To participate in the being of Jesus is to be free, and thus transcendence is experienced in human life as liberation. This is not a freedom from any particular set of restrictions but it is a freedom for others. As early as 1932, Bonhoeffer insisted that human freedom be understood in strictly social terms as man’s freedom for others. According to Bonhoeffer, freedom functions as a middle term between transcendence and acts of love. Freedom is rooted in God and Jesus disclosed God’s freedom as freedom for human beings. This freedom provides the necessary human conditions for effectively caring for others. Jesus maintains this freedom to be for others even to the point of suffering and death. In this freedom from self, says Bonhoeffer, is to be found all that we can know of God’s omnipotence, omniscience, and omnipresence.

Our relation to the transcendent God is the reconciliation seen in Jesus’ freedom to live for others. Our relation to God, whose transcendence is reconciliation seen in Jesus’ freedom to live for others is not a ‘religious’ relationship to the highest, most powerful, and best Being imaginable -- that is not authentic transcendence -- but our relation to God is a new life in ‘existence for others’, through participation in the being of Jesus. The transcendental is not infinite and unattainable tasks, but the neighbour who is within reach in any given situation. God in human form -- not, as in oriental religions, in animal form, monstrous, chaotic, remote, and terrifying, nor in the conceptual forms of the absolute, metaphysical, infinite, etc., nor yet in the Greek divine-human form of ‘man himself’, but ‘the man for others’, and therefore the Crucified, the man who lives out of the transcendent.\textsuperscript{18}
Encounter in Humanization: Insights for Christian-Marxist Dialogue and Cooperation

God’s transcendence is manifested not in ‘religion’ but in a new orientation of human being toward life: existing for others after the pattern and in the power of Jesus’ utterly selfless life.

The new life which is participation in the transcendence is experienced chiefly as powerlessness and suffering. God at the centre of life is revealed most clearly and decisively in the cross of Christ.

God lets himself be pushed out of the world on to the cross. He is weak and powerless in the world, and that is precisely the way, in which he is with us and helps us... Christ helps us, not by virtue of his omnipotence, but by virtue of his weakness and suffering.\textsuperscript{19}

All those in a ‘non-religious’ world, who out of full human responsibility for others experience weakness and suffering, participate in the cross and hence in the transcendence of God. Thus, Christian faith is not merely a belief in a concept called transcendence, but the appropriation of that transcendence which is "the experience that a transformation of all human life is given in the fact that "Jesus is there only for others."\textsuperscript{20}

Marx and Bonhoeffer emphasized the autonomy of the human being. But in the search for such autonomy of the human being Bonhoeffer was not so much removing God from the world’s affairs as searching for God’s real presence in that world. Whereas Marx found God as standing in the way of human freedom and autonomy, a barrier to human emancipation, Bonhoeffer believed that God granted human freedom and autonomy by making Jesus the point of disclosure for His transcendence. Whereas Marx defined transcendence as the human beings’ possibility to move towards the future with freedom and choice, so that they could shape their own destiny, Bonhoeffer gave a this-worldly interpretation of transcendence in which the experience of transcendence is Jesus "being there for others". We already found that Jesus being there for others means that the transcendent is met in the concern for others as given to us in the life and way of Jesus and our faith is nothing but "participation in this being of Jesus". Transcendence, thus, refers to the transformation the sovereign and eternal God has effected upon the concrete human situation in terms of reconciliation, redemption, the restoration of health, the healing of social and political divisions etc. Transcendence therefore is an ongoing process. Accordingly, transcendence must be grasped, not as it has so often been in the past, in spatial terms referring to the God "up there" beyond the affairs of human life, but specifically in terms of what God has effected historically, and is doing now, on behalf of human beings.

By introducing the concept of this-worldly transcendence, by no means is Bonhoeffer writing off the transcendence of God in favour of His immanence. Rather, he believes that the idea of incarnation is conceivable only where there is both transcendence and immanence. And yet, in the incarnation God has affirmed the world and history in such a way that it is impossible to confine our apprehension of Him to a mythological or metaphysical elaboration of the event of incarnation. There should be some logical way of interpreting that event to the modern "non-religious" man. This is precisely what Bonhoeffer does by introducing the concept of this-worldly transcendence. He makes use of the humiliation of Jesus as the basis of his plea for a this -- worldly understanding of transcendence. Jesus is the man in whom God reveals Himself, and He reveals Himself by absenting Himself in His power and glory. In this way, God reveals to us the this-worldly nature of His transcendence. And faith, in the full sense, can be understood only as human response to this revelation. Our relation to God, then, is a new life and not ‘religion’ in the traditional sense of the term; it is freedom to act responsibly for our neighbour’s good, and not a ‘religious’ relationship to a metaphysical being.

The importance of Bonhoeffer’s interpretation of transcendence is that he gave it a profound sociological, and thus this-worldly dimension. Instead of defining the relationship of the individual to the transcendent God solely in spiritual and individualistic ways, by employing the concept of this-worldly transcendence he challenged the individuals to a "transformation of all human life" and thus to struggle for the transformation of society by participating in Jesus’ "being there for others". The world isolated in its own autonomy, which does not take seriously the revelation of God in this Jesus Christ, is only a utopia of ambitious persons. For "the world has no reality of its own, independently of the revelation of God in Christ".21
Notes:

4. Ibid., pp. 30f.

5. Ibid., p. 46

6. Ibid., p. 47.

7. Ibid., p. 48.

8. Ibid.

11. Ibid., p. 198f.

12. Ibid.

13. LPP, op. cit., p. 282 (30 April 1944)

14. LPP, op. cit., p. 381 (Outline for a book)

15. LPP, op. cit., p. 312 (29 May 1944)

18. LPP, op. cit., p. 381 ("Outline for a Book")

20. LPP, op. cit., p. 381 ("Outline for a Book")

Bishop Paulose Mar Paulsoe prefers to call himself a "secular theologian" because he communicates the Christian faith in secular language. He received his Ph.D. from Princeton Theological Seminary for a dissertation on Bonhoeffer’s corrective of Karl Marx. He was a Bishop in the Chaldean Syrian Church in Kerala, India and served as President of the World Student Christian Federation. Published by Christava Sahitya Samithy (CSS), Tiruvalla-689 101, Kerala, S. India. This material was prepared for Religion Online by Ted and Winnie Brock.

Chapter 11: Bonhoefferian Theology as Challenge to Marxism

In this chapter, we shall first summarize our findings and examine the implications of Bonhoeffer’s theology for the church’s life today. We shall then proceed to inquire how Bonhoefferian theology functions as a challenge to Marxist philosophy.

The thrust of Bonhoeffer’s theology, as we described it in the preceding pages, has been the Christocentric view of human life. The vision of the ever-living and ever-present Jesus Christ gave him the right perspective from which to look at every event and every problem of life. It also made him free to cope with any situation without fear and anxiety. Bonhoeffer emphasized that in the modern secular age the mission of the church must assume a secular style. God’s becoming human in Jesus represents a kind of radical secularization. God laid aside His religiousness and divine attributes, and took upon Himself the form of a servant. This was a secular form. Bonhoeffer exhorts Christians to assume the same secular form in their mission to the mature world.

This means that the individual Christian will have to assume a new life style. Bonhoeffer tells us that the Christian is not a special kind of human being, a saint or homo religiosur. To be a Christian means to be one who lives with the joy and freedom which belong to one’s proper nature. Christian life is lived entirely in the world. Christian love is not a religious exercise or a spiritual concern. It is responsible action in the world. "Taking life in one’s stride" and living unreservedly in all that it brings, then, is accepting the world God has given us as the place of our pilgrimage. This is not to accept this world as the only world we know. Our horizons extend beyond earthly existence, since the ultimate has been revealed to us beyond the penultimate.

It is in this sense that we must understand Bonhoeffer’s call for a "religionless Christianity". It is certainly true of the Christian’s faith that its risen Lord is present in all boundary situations, all possible life-crisis -- but also in situations which occur in the centre of life. As Bonhoeffer sees it, the Bible is a recall to that faith, to the life in the world which is under God. Bonhoeffer’s consistent effort for a non-religious interpretation of Christianity was to reform the church in such a way that it could truly be a prophet and servant to the contemporary man. Where that is recognized there is no place for any criticism of Bonhoeffer’s vision of religionless Christianity.

Bonhoeffer has quite simply and clearly called the church to new obedience to the commandment of Jesus Christ. We can never know God as an idea, but only in and through our concrete encounter with others in our life in the world. God is to be known in human form, as a man existing for others; and the sole ground for the doctrine of His omnipotence, omniscience and omnipresence in His freedom from self, maintained even to the point of the death of God incarnate. It is from this new understanding of transcendence that Bonhoeffer would have us re-interpret Biblical and theological concepts. His theology is one of commitment and involvement. To be a Christian means to be committed to and involved in a way of life in the world, and this is God’s own way, as He is revealed in Jesus Christ.

According to Bonhoeffer, the message of the gospel enables the Christian to be fully in the world, but not of it. The world is the place where God’s grace is operative. Writing to his fiancée from the prison, he expressed this faith in these succinct words:

> When I... think about the situation of the world, the complete darkness over our personal fate and my present imprisonment, then I believe that our union can only be a sign of God’s grace and kindness, which calls us to faith.
We would be blind if we did not see it. Jeremiah says at the moment of his people’s great need "still one shall buy houses and acres in this land" as a sign of trust in the future. This is where faith belongs. May God give it to us daily. And I do not mean the faith which flees the world, but the one that endures the world and which loves and remains true to the world in spite of all the suffering which it contains for us. Our marriage shall be a yes to God’s earth; it shall strengthen our courage to act and accomplish something on the earth. I fear that Christians who stand with only one leg upon earth also stand with only one leg in heaven.¹

However, in relating faith to the reality of the world, Bonhoeffer does not support any unconditional affirmation of the world’s maturity or of the secularity which is its counterpoint.

Many people take it for granted that by his concept of religionless Christianity Bonhoeffer completely denies the necessity of religion. We may make this hasty judgment only if we take his words out of context, or if we do not give due consideration to the presuppositions he makes before he criticizes religion. In Ethics Bonhoeffer says that the Christian, even if ultimately concerned with "last things’, must be immediately concerned with "things before last", that is to say, with the things of this world. At the same time he reminds us that the Christian is a person who is being "conformed" to Christ. This conformation takes place when "the form of Jesus Christ itself works upon us in such a manner that it moulds our form in its own likeness".² This does not happen because of our own efforts of will to be like Jesus. It is the work of grace, something that happens to us. The grace of God "opens before the secularized man of our time a dimension of human existence which might help him to live, in the midst of the confusion of his personal and social existence, with hope and responsibility."³ Through prayer, meditation, worship, the sacraments, etc., our lives have been touched and transformed by the same God who was in Christ. If this is religion, then Bonhoeffer would certainly say that religion is fundamental to Christian life.

Let us not forget that the most radical critics of religion have spoken from within, and have been people with a clear vision of God. The prophets summoned people from empty cults to a genuine obedience before the Lord God. Jesus condemned the false religiosity of the Pharisees. The Apostles criticized some of the stringent religious practices of their time and stopped them. Bonhoeffer also stands in this tradition. The historical situation in which he lived moved him to criticize religion, for he lived in a religionless environment, where Christianity had been rejected. To his utmost disappointment, the large number of German Christians supported the Nazi state, as distinct from the Confessing Church which opposed it. Bonhoeffer recognized that in an increasingly secularized world a time might come when Christianity everywhere would be deprived of the recognition and privileges that it once enjoyed. He realized that Christians would have to depend more and more on the inward resources of faith, and less and less on outward supports. However, this does not mean that they would have to live without the spiritual practices of religion. Bonhoeffer himself called the church to practice the "secret discipline" so that it may become in itself a living witness before it attempts too much to speak to the world.

Our Church, which has been fighting in these years only for its self-preservation, as though that were an end in itself, is incapable of taking the word of reconciliation and redemption to mankind and the world. Our earlier words are therefore bound to lose their force and cease, and our being Christians today will be limited to two things: prayer and righteous action among man.

It is the secret discipline which gives the Christian the direction for his mission. But at the same time Bonhoeffer also believed that our prayer and worship are all in vain if they make no difference to our lives or to the way we treat our neighbours. As Helmut Thielicke points out, Bonhoeffer did not reject the necessity of working on the liturgy and removing it, but he did say, "Only he who cries out for the Jews dare permit himself to sing in Gregorian." He thereby blocked the potential escapist’s path.

Here we see no opposition to spirituality, but we are not allowed to use spirituality to avoid the demand of Christ that our lives be lived fully for others. Our spirituality should lead us to a sacramental presence in the world after the manner of Jesus himself. Jesus himself is the real sacrament. He is the one through whose sacrificial action God touches and renews this world. Hence our partaking of the sacrament is not just a religious practice, but it means our participation in the suffering of God in the world. It is in this way that we witness to the lordship of Christ. As Charles West put it,

..only the Christian’s humble but confident journey itself, with whatever charges and burdens may be given him to carry, only his realistic concern for neighbours at cost to himself, can convince the unbeliever that the Lord and guide of the journey is the servant son of God who bore the cross.7

Bonhoeffer’s plea for a religionless Christianity is also a plea for re-definition of the church. The church is an instrument for mission by the providence of God. As much as instruments need to be repaired, they have also to be refashioned from time to time according to changes in the nature and scope of the work for which they are used. That is why Bonhoeffer reminds us that if the church is to fulfil its mission it needs to be renewed and refashioned from within.

Thus the ministry of the church is both renewal within and mission to the world. This means that the centre of church’s concern should shift from within her walls to the surrounding community, and from exercises of ingrown piety to exercises of outgoing faith. This also means that our faith must be understood as commitment to work for the purposes of God and not as a pious hope for the next life. We can no longer regard the church building as the gate of heaven, but more as the gateway of the Christian to the world. Bonhoeffer also reminds us that the mission of the church should not be conceived relative to isolated verses from the Bible, but relative to the central Biblical theme of God’s choice of human beings and of the peoples to bear His mission to the world. It is not an election to privilege, but an election to responsibility. Thus the mission is seen to be continuous with that of the chosen people Israel and of Jesus himself. The Israelites were to live and even to suffer in such a manner as to bring God’s blessings upon all the nations of the earth. So also the church exists for the world and cannot live for itself. The mission is to be directed to human society in all its complexity, and not to an isolated entity within man called ‘soul’ or to a dimension of life called ‘spiritual’. The climax of the Bible story is not the salvation of individuals to some spiritual heaven - it is the renewal of God’s creation, the coming of "a new heaven and a new earth". That is why the goal of history is not just that "the saved" will go to heaven --it is the "new Jerusalem", the city in which all the nations will find their true life and their true selfhood, in the light of Christ.
We shall now turn our attention to see how Bonhoefferian theology functions as a challenge to Marxist philosophy. From Bonhoeffer’s critique of religion it can be seen that he retained kinship with Marx in many respects. Marx’s criticism, though it may sound exaggerated, does not take away the responsibility from the Christians to re-think their own beliefs. Let us not forget that there is some truth in Marx’s critique of religion, and of Christianity in particular. Many a Christian has found in religion an excuse for not bothering with mundane problems. If Marx can awaken such Christians from their dogmatic slumber, we should be ready to salute Marx. In this sense Bonhoeffer’s critique of religion is analogous to that of Marx’s. We can even draw a parallel between "opium of the people" and "cheap grace". For Marx, "Religion is the sigh of the oppressed creature, the heart of a heartless world, just as it is the spirit of a spiritless situation. It is the opium of the people."

According to Bonhoeffer, "We Lutherans have gathered like eagles round the carcass of cheap grace, and there we have drunk of the poison which has killed the life of following Christ." In spite of this apparent similarity in their thoughts, Bonhoefferian theology functions as a corrective of Marx’s critique of religion.

Marx argued that religion is an ideology which does not serve any real purpose to solve the problems of human beings who suffer from the miseries of this world. "Religion is the fantastic (phantastische) realization of the human essence because the human essence has no true reality." It gives only illusory satisfaction to the oppressed people, and it is in this sense Marx regards religion as opium of the people. Here Bonhoefferian theology confronts Marxism with its steadfast concentration upon Christology. The figure of the incarnate, crucified, and risen Lord captivates his attention and evokes his faithful obedience. Bonhoeffer reminds us that the answer to the problem of ideology lies in the way the Christian responds to the fact that God so loved the world, that He sent Jesus Christ into the centre of it, into the midst of the intricacies of man’s relation to man. Christians are called to confront the world with this Christ, in that they share the being of Christ with their neighbours. This confrontation, Bonhoeffer says, may not take the form of words at all, but of participation in common responsibilities with the world. On the occasion of the Baptism of D.W.R. Bethge, Bonhoeffer wrote:

For you thought and action will enter on a new relationship; your thinking will be confined to your responsibilities in action. With us thought was often the luxury of the onlooker; with you it will be entirely subordinated to action. "Not everyone who says to me, ‘Lord, Lord’, shall enter the kingdom of heaven, but he who does the will of my father who is in heaven." 9

Here the Christian will act as one who knows that the reality of this world’s human relations is the reality of Christ’s relation to it. Human beings exists in a field of personal relations in the centre of which is Jesus Christ.

Bonhoefferian theology challenges contemporary Marxists to change their attitude toward religion, and specifically to the question of God. Bonhoeffer is not speaking of a metaphysical concept of God but the God who is interested in the affairs of the world, not a God of metaphysical scheme but the God of history, of society, of the future -- all in the concrete sense of God’s way for mankind in Jesus Christ. If God is denied ideologically, as Marx does, the human being is threatened to become dissolved in the ‘penultimate’. The ‘penultimate’ becomes ‘ultimate’ for people. Their total destiny then depends on their own accomplishments. As long as the human beings face only successes in life this dependence on accomplishments makes sense. But, then, what about human despair and frustration as they are evident in human failure? Marx is not concerned about this question.

Here Bonhoefferian theology challenges Marxists to reexamine their philosophy to see whether they take into consideration the human person in wholeness. As Josef Hromadka stated,

Only that philosophy is right which wants not only to demonstrate and to interpret, to contemplate and to describe, but also wants to change the world and to transform it in the direction of perfect social justice and equality, freedom from hunger and misery, from injustice and exploitation. 10

In his "Theses on Feuerbach," Marx said: "The philosophers have only interpreted the world, in various ways; the point, however, is to change it." But this thought provoking thesis was only helpful to promote one more impressive idea -- unquestionably a welcome one -- that theory and practice should be united. In order to change the world, philosophy must embrace the totality of human existence, its material as well as spiritual dimension. Marx fails to do this.

In this respect, Bonhoefferian theology is an advance on Marxist philosophy. Bonhoeffer reminds the Marxists that the gospel is concerned about the whole of life, and not merely certain aspects of life. There is no area of human experience to which it is not related. It may be true that religion has been narrowly confined to acts of worship, to certain spheres of human relationship, to the realm of the ‘spiritual’ as differentiated from that of the ‘secular.’ This is so because many Christians have not understood the true significance of their faith as total commitment of all that concerns their individual and collective life to the sovereign lordship of Jesus Christ. For Bonhoeffer, secularity means that all of life is a gift from God, and authentic secularity is a fruit of the incarnation. Even politics and economics are subject to God’s standards, control and judgment. By introducing the concept of religionless Christianity, as it is expounded in the themes of "Holy Worldliness", "Theology of Responsibility" and "Secret Discipline", Bonhoeffer appeals to the Marxists to reconsider their attitude toward Christianity in that authentic Christian faith is something other than the ‘religion’ Marx criticized. Marx’s theory that all religions are enemies of social revolution does not hold true. The "religionless Christian" who leads a "worldly life", as portrayed by Bonhoeffer, certainly plays a vital role in the transformation of society.

Marx interpreted human being as part of a historical process. Everything is related to a historical development and conceived as a by-product of the past and of the present objective situation. Human beings eliminate anything that could not be understood and perfectly explained on the basis of the continuous unbreakable chains of the processes of nature and history. It is true in "The Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Bonaparte", Marx said: "Men make their own history". But, then, he continues:

They do not make it just as they please: they do not make it under circumstances chosen by themselves, but under circumstances directly encountered, given and transmitted from the past. The tradition of all the dead generations weighs like a nightmare on the brain of the living. ¹¹

Thus, according to Marx, human reason, conscience, and the very essence of the human being have no independent meaning. They do not transcend the boundary of historical process. They are part and parcel of historical nexus. In other words, human beings are caught up in a trap of historical process.

Here Bonhoefferian theology raises its objection and disagreement. "Man is not only a part of nature and history. He is an entity in himself, standing as a responsible, morally and intellectually active, creative being, directing the way of history. History is his sphere of responsibility". This is not just another expression of some kind of idealistic philosophy, rather a consequence of the incarnation of Jesus Christ who is the Lord of nature and history.

... the whole reality of the world is already drawn in into Christ and bound together in Him, and the movement of history consists solely in divergence and convergence in relation to this center. 12

We cannot demonstrate or explain this reality impinged by Jesus Christ by scientific means. But the Christian knows by faith that it is more real than anything demonstrable and explainable. It is this impingement which has shaped the history of human beings and thus, being beyond history, it is the most dynamic force in human life to transform the world.

The world, the natural, the profane and reason are now all taken up into God from the outset. They do not exist "in themselves" and "on their own account"; They have their reality nowhere save in the reality of God, in Christ.13

Human beings are not completely left alone in the trap of history, but are caught up in the reality of God as it is evident in Jesus Christ. The only way to demonstrate this reality is by personal witness and by fellowship with those who have heard and accepted this self-revelation of God. This is precisely what Bonhoeffer does with his theology as well as with his life.

Marx said: "To be radical is to grasp the root of the matter. But for man the root is man himself."14 This undue optimism in the human person is foreign to the Christian concept of human being. Referring to Jesus Christ as the norm and standard of the human being, Karl Barth says:

The being of man is the history which shows how one of God’s creatures, elected and called by God, is caught up in personal responsibility before Him and proves itself capable of fulfilling it.\textsuperscript{15}

Bonhoeffer also is thinking in a similar way. According to him, human being is rooted in Jesus Christ. It is He who creates meaning and purpose in life, and it is through Him we know our creatureliness.

Only in Christ does man know himself as the creature of God... If he is to know himself as the creature of God, the old man must have died and the new arisen, whose essence it is to live in self-disregard, wholly in the contemplation of Christ. He knows himself as one who lives in Christ in identity with the old man who passed through death -- knows himself as the creature of God.\textsuperscript{16}

Christ recreates the being of persons so that the centre of existence is no longer in themselves. It is being-in-Christ. By this recreation the believer is constituted as a free person with responsibility in relation to Christ and fellow human beings. The zeal of the Christian for the transformation of society, or the revolution in which the Christian is engaged in to change the structures of society, is nothing but following Christ where He has preceded us. Paul Lehmann underlines this thought in these words:

As regards what it means to be human and to gain the power to stay human, Jesus Christ is the "wisdom of God" and the "power of God" (1 Cor. 1:24). He is "the truth that will make (men) free" (John 8:32). In him men are already on the way toward being fully human -- that is, whole, complete in themselves because completely related to their kind and to everything that God has made. Thus to be human is to be what God made and purposed man to be, and to exhibit the fact that God’s chief purpose and man’s chief end are identical.\textsuperscript{17}

Marx conceived transcendence as a dynamic human reality, as a self-transcending formation of the meaning and values of our life. By transcendence he meant the movement of the living and humanly experienced present into the future. It is the human being’s openness to what is to come and it is an unlimited openness. The future to which human being is moving is completely open. Here Bonhoefferian theology would question the content of the future which Marx envisions.
Would this future be just an extension of the present with all its experienced conflicts or would there be a qualitative difference in that future? If transcendence is only a leap into the future, as Marx conceives it, and if that future has no qualitative difference from the present, then, human beings remain in the abyss of existential predicament. In contrast to Marx’s concept of transcendence, Bonhoeffer gave a this-worldly interpretation of transcendence in which the experience of transcendence is Jesus’ "being there for others." This means the transcendent God is met in the concern for others as given to us in the life and way of Jesus. A Christian’s faith is nothing but "participation in this being of Jesus" Transcendence, thus, refers to the transformation God effects upon humanity in its entirety. In this way, the future which the Christian looks forward to is not just an extension of the present; it is qualitatively different.

Marx considered human beings as limitless. He believed that God is the end of the possibilities which are the breath of our being. According to him, nature and human being are no longer two powers in opposition to one another, but two terms of one relation. The human being rises over all other animal species and begins an historical evolution; becoming the creator of a better society.

But it is wrong to say that only this kind of naturalism can open the way for true humanity. Real humanity of the person is exclusively founded in the human being’s dependence on God and His will. Otherwise they misuse neighbour and nature, as is evident in many Marxist societies. In many parts of the world Marxist ideology has become a betrayal of the revolution in which the world is engaged in. Its hope is in an earthly utopia. The proletarian, whom Marx extolled to the highest degree, finds himself being used for the ends of the party’s strategy, rather than being himself the object of concern. The ideal of a socialist society and the hope for a classless society are used to cover continued exploitation, and the hope for a classless society becomes the opium for the people. Thus the vices against which Marx rebelled return in new clothing because this revolutionary power in itself is corruptible.

According to Bonhoeffer "Man’s humanity is not based upon himself or upon nature but is only possible in obedience to his Lord. Man is a limited being. The Lord Himself who gives man life, spirit, and form is his limit, and this limit is grace, the source of freedom." "The limit [of man] is grace because it is the basis of creatureliness and freedom. . . Grace is that which supports man over the abyss of non-being, non-living, that what is not created."\textsuperscript{18} It is this grace which defines the form and direction of human freedom. The human being with power and freedom to have dominion over the whole creation is given the possibilities to explore nature. But this freedom for exploration should not blind the human limits. Human beings should know the possibilities given "in relation" to God and fellow human beings, and not in the light of the infinite possibilities of which Marx speaks about. As Charles West put it:

\begin{quote}
Man is to know himself in relation, and not himself as master or absolute subject, apart from the relation. In short he is to know good, but not good and evil. He is to be creature, and not God.\textsuperscript{19}
\end{quote}

Marx was keenly aware of the necessity of humanization of society. He asserted that humanization can be attained by the abolition of private property, the most important cause of dehumanization. This humanization is something which human beings and only they can accomplish. Paul Lehmann calls this "humanistic messianism".

\textit{Humanistic messianism} is a passion for and vision of human deliverance and fulfillment by the powers of man alone. Its radical immanentism denies the reality and the necessity of incarnation.\textsuperscript{20}

Humanistic messianism was able to change the relations of property, but it was not able to replace property with a new value. The roots of evil go beyond social and economic conditions. The reality of evil cannot be abolished by the humanized society. This is not mere pessimism, nor an indifferent attitude to social and political aspirations of humanity, but an appeal to give up the illusory hopes of human beings. Even the humanized society will badly need the message of the divine grace, forgiveness, redemption, and self-denying love.

According to Bonhoeffer, humanization is possible because of the incarnation. It is not human accomplishment, but a gift from God. In Jesus Christ God became a human being. He is the one who leads the path to humanization, and Christians are called to be agents of the process of humanization.

‘Ecce homo’!- Behold the man! In Him the world was reconciled with God. It is not by its overthrowing but by its reconciliation that the world is subdued. It is not by ideals and programmes or by conscience, duty, responsibility and virtue that reality can be confronted and overcome, but simply and solely by the perfect love of God. Here again it is not by a general idea of love that this is achieved, but by the really lived love of God in Jesus Christ.²¹

Again, in the words of Paul Lehmann, this can be called "messianic humanism"

_Messianic humanism . . . is a passion for and vision of human deliverance and fulfillment derived from the fact and the power of God’s incarnate humanity in Jesus Christ. Its divinely initiated reality and orientation deny the reality and the possibility of the faith and ethos of immanent humanism._²²

Messianic humanism keeps the horizons of human solidarity open, seeking in every situation new possibilities for a greater justice, freedom, and peace.

From a Bonhoefferian point of view the kernel of humanization is God’s re-definition of our self-understanding and His re-direction of our freedom. This re-definition and re-direction is the heart of what happened in Jesus Christ. Thus, the criterion of humanization is Jesus Christ Himself. Authentic humanization is God’s humanization by which God self-humanized in Jesus Christ. The task of humanization can be accomplished only in relation to and dependence on God, the author of humanization. We do this by participating in Jesus’ "being there for others". This is to see the world in the hands of the redeemer and to be concerned for its peace, its prosperity, and its solidarity in love. It means to take one’s place as a servant and witness of Christ’s work, free from anxiety about the successes of our revolutions or the maintenance of our structures. We are not called to be successful but to be faithful.

Marx, of course, disagrees. According to him, dependence on God and human freedom are incompatible. He understands freedom as independence. "A being only considers himself independent when he stands on his own feet; and he only stands on his own feet when he owes his existence to himself."23

This is precisely what Emil Brunner called sin: "Sin is emancipation from God, giving up the attitude of dependence, in order to try to win full independence, which makes human beings equal with God. The nature of sin is shown by Jesus in the son who asks his father for his inheritance in order that he may leave home and become independent".24

This longing to be ‘independent’ is not bound to certain social structures -- let them be capitalistic or proletarian. Man is a sinner means that everything is under God’s curse. There is no sinless relationship between man and nature, man and neighbour, but everything is infected by the same perversion. it is hopeless to change this situation just by abolishing private property.

Property in itself is not bad but human beings who use it may be. There is no difference, whether we speak of private property or of state capitalism, there is always a group or class which is privileged above others to own or to enjoy. The question is: whether everybody uses gifts according to God’s will or according to his selfishness, whether the structures of society are filled with responsibility to God and the neighbour or they are being used for the benefit of certain groups at the cost of the other members of society. Here Bonhoeffer reminds Marxists that the responsibility and freedom of human beings are rooted in what is beyond nature and history. Only as we penetrate the depth of this fact can we save human beings from the tyranny of the material world. Bonhoeffer says:

Responsibility and freedom are corresponding concepts. Factually, though not chronologically, responsibility presupposes freedom and freedom can consist only in responsibility. Responsibility is the freedom of men which is given only in the obligation to God and to our neighbour.25

Freedom is impossible as long as there is no real responsibility to God. Marx rejected every responsibility to God and attacked every belief in God. He was convinced that human beings can and must create their own conditions for living perfectly. Consequently, "humanistic messianism" as seen in Marxist societies can only create new wrong social structures. On the contrary, the Biblical witness reveals the evil roots of human misery and economic conditions of human life. It makes human beings with the deepest personal identity responsible for their actions, successes and failures, without denying the urgency of the struggle for social, economic, and political pre-requisites of righteousness, equality, and brotherhood. As Bonhoeffer put it:

The action of the responsible man is performed in the obligation which alone gives freedom and which gives entire freedom, the obligation to God and to our neighbour as they confront us in Jesus Christ.

Bonhoeffer reminds us that it is Christ, and Christ alone, who validates the world of responsible secular people. The meaning of the life of Jesus of Nazareth is that God and the world can no longer be separated.

Whoever sets eyes on the body of Jesus Christ in faith can never again speak of the world as though it were lost, as though it were separated from Christ... it is only in Christ that the world is what it is.

If Christ is the Lord of all, then, we are called in obedience to serve all people in his name. It is this obedience, and not some revolutionary principles, which should lead us to servanthood. In that sense our service is a diakonia, a reflection of God’s love for the people. Conformed to the image of Christ, we are given new possibilities for service in the world. Here again Bonhoeffer is concerned not to provide religious sanction for some worldly movement but to discern the form of Christ’s work in the world and bear witness to it by our own words and actions. The Christian’s task is to find out where God is on the move in His world today, and then make all possible haste to be there with Him. In this way we respond to Marx’s critique of religion that Christianity is not the opium of the people but a way of life in which the Christian participates in Jesus’ "being there for others" for the total humanization of humanity.

Notes:

1. LPP, op. cit., p. 415 ("The Other Letters from Prison"). The letter was dated 12 August 1943.

26. Ibid., p. 249.

27. Ibid., p. 205.
Bishop Paulose Mar Paulsoe prefers to call himself a "secular theologian" because he communicates the Christian faith in secular language. He received his Ph.D. from Princeton Theological Seminary for a dissertation on Bonhoeffer’s corrective of Karl Marx. He was a Bishop in the Chaldean Syrian Church in Kerala, India and served as President of the World Student Christian Federation. Published by Christava Sahitya Samithy (CSS), Tiruvalla-689 101, Kerala, S. India. This material was prepared for Religion Online by Ted and Winnie Brock.

Chapter 12: A Call For Dialogue

The purpose of this study has not been to erect a platform from which to defend Christianity or to hurl invectives at Marxists. Rather it is to seek ways which will give to all of us an opportunity to live in fellowship despite our differences, and to understand those differences in such a way that the fellowship can increase even though the differences do not decrease. The corrective we made of Marx’s critique of religion and the challenge we presented to Marxism are not meant to proclaim the superiority of Christianity, or to prove that Christianity is better equipped with solutions to human problems. They are intended to remind both Marxists and Christians how profound human life is meant to be in the providence of God, how we have fallen short in our attempts to reach that profundity, and how we might help each other to attain that profundity.

By examining Marx’s critique of religion optimistically and without prejudice we found that Marxists and Christians can agree, in spite of several disagreements, that both are ultimately concerned for true humanity, especially for the rights of the poor and needy, the hungry and hopeless; both could agree that they strive to be "true to the earth".¹ We observed that Marx’s atheism is primarily an anthropological affirmation; it is another way of putting human being in the centre of human interest and concern. We also found that Marx’s critique of religion indeed helps us to awaken from our dogmatic slumber. By making a Bonhoefferian corrective of Marx’s critique of religion, we demonstrated that whatever the traditional interpretation or historical function of Christian faith may have been, its essential ingredients allow for a radical affirmation of the person’s this-worldly being. The essence of Christian faith is even consistent with unqualified commitment to revolutionary struggle in the name of human beings against the forces of alienation. This corrective also served the purpose of presenting to the church a new understanding of itself and of the autonomous modern world, and it reminded us what it means to be a Christian in the world come of age.

This renewed understanding of faith has serious implications for our encounter with Marxism. Conviction about one’s own beliefs does not necessarily involve condemnation of the beliefs of others. If one describes oneself as a Christian it would follow that one would ascribe validity of the substance of that faith. And if one is convinced of the validity of one’s beliefs one should be free to commend them to others, and correct the positions of others if necessary. This does not mean that we reject the being of the other person, but that we affirm humanity. Such freedom to hold to ones own beliefs, to give expression to them in characteristic forms, and to tell others about them ought to be the privilege of all human beings. This calls forth a dialogue between Marxists and Christians.

The Church’s renewed understanding of herself and of the world makes it possible for her henceforth to enter into dialogue with everybody, without abandoning her "claim to exclusiveness", . . . which previously seemed to make sincere dialogue virtually impossible in advance both for the world and for the Church.²

As far as the dialogue between Marxists and Christians is concerned, it is the affirmation of our faith which motivates, and which should motivate Christians to enter into dialogue. Our faith becomes more meaningful only when we live in encounter with fellow human beings. "The Church is the sacrament of dialogue, of communication between men."³ Dialogue is a way in which we express our humanity. Those who believe in a God who is living and active must hold that His spirit is present in all situations. They therefore enter into dialogue in expectation and hope; not solely or primarily for the conversion of the other. The Christian enters dialogue seeking enlightenment and enrichment as he or she probes more deeply into ‘the unsearchable riches of Christ’ (Eph. 3:8).

The history of the past three decades will tell us that both Christianity and Marxism have come to a new awareness of their positions. Today the church is stripped of the secular support of the "Constantinian era". It is aware of its minority situation in society. Even in the so-called Christian countries of the West the serious impact of the current trend of secularization has placed the church in a minority situation. We can no longer be masters of society. Our service is a service of "Socratic evangelism". Christians may no longer act as those who know everything better, or as those who know all truth, but as those who help to find the truth. As midwives they help bring truth into being.

This new awareness of the church, for which Bonhoeffer himself is partly responsible, has not become an ideology; it has taken the form of action. In many European countries the turning point in the church’s encounter with Marxism was World War II. In concentration camps and in resistance movements there was the possibility of common action and common suffering, of mutual respect and eventually of understanding. The Second Vatican Council contributed greatly in changing the climate and encouraging reconsideration of traditional positions of Christians and atheists. Pope John XXIII’s encyclical, Pacem in Terris, has taken into consideration the question of the church’s dialogue with the world.

The council established the Secretariat for Non-believers which seek to enter into dialogue with all forms of atheism. In 1966 WCC’s Church and Society Conference of Geneva recommended a dialogue between Christians and advocates of non-Christian ideologies. In the conference report there is even a passage which will remind us Marx’s famous declaration, "The philosophers have only interpreted the world, in various ways; the point, however, is to change it." The conference affirmed that Christianity remains a discipline which aims not at a theoretical system of truth but at action in human society. Its object is not simply to understand the world but to respond to the power of God which is recreating it. . . Christian theology is prophetic only in so far as it dares, in full reflection, to declare how, at a particular place and time, God is at work, and thus to show the Church where and when to participate in his work.
These developments show that the church is vitally interested in the thoughts and problems of this world.

The church’s newfound openness has shattered the chains of the social order of Marx’s time. Marxist thinkers have well responded to these changes. When the death-of-God theology stormed the theological arena in the United States, Vitezslav Gardavsky, then a professor of Marxist philosophy at the Brno Military Academy in Czechoslovakia, challenged his Marxist colleagues with a book entitled God Is Not Yet Dead. Though Gardavsky was not speaking for the Communist Party, it is significant that such a title came from a Marxist Philosopher. His book is both an argued defense of atheism and an attempt to understand what Christianity can offer to Marxism.

Luigi Longo, then Secretary General of the Italian Communist Party, said at the 11th Party Congress in January 1966:

> We are now witnessing a transcending of the ideological positions of conservatism, which made religious ‘ideology’ of the ‘opium of the people’ and the change is the result of the new way the church is facing up to modern world.

Even more revealing was the statement made by Dolores Ibarruri to the leaders of the Communist Parties gathered for an important meeting in Karlovy Vary (Karlsbad) in April 1967. She said:

> We cannot close our eyes to the changes in the Catholic Church which are going on before us. Should we still attempt to repulse forces (referring to Christians) who no longer want to be the opium of the people, but to change society? The Communists must give more respect to the political and philosophical thought of the Catholics.

She was speaking out of her concrete experience in Spain, where many Christians were actively involved in the process of social change. In short, many Marxists still show their willingness to give serious attention to Marx’s statement: "the criticism of religion is in the main complete."
This openness on the part of Christians and Marxists has brought them together on various occasions for dialogue with each other. Thus in 1965 the Czech Communists, on the 550th anniversary of the martyrdom of John Hus, invited Catholic and Protestant scholars from the West to an international symposium on Hus. In 1966 the Roman Catholic publisher, Herder & Herder, Inc., brought out two books as its contribution to the Marxist-Christian dialogue. During their publication a dialogue took place at the Harvard Divinity School in which the two authors and several leading theologians and philosophers from the United States participated. In 1967 the Sociological Institute of the Czechoslovakian Academy of Science and the Paulus-Gesellschaft (an organization of theologians and scientists) invited two hundred Marxist and Christian philosophers, scientists and theologians for a dialogue at Marianbad (Czechoslovakia). These are only some of the dialogues which took place in the 1960’s between Marxists and Christians. Even though these dialogues didn’t produce noticeable joint action in service of humanity, they did create an atmosphere for mutual trust. But in 1968 both Russia’s invasion of Czechoslovakia and the United States’ escalation of the Vietnam War broke the dialogue and created an environment of mistrust.

The dialogue needs to continue. In a way, both Marxists and Christians are talking about the same thing: actual human being in the real world and society. But although they are talking about the same thing, they are doing it from different points of view. That is why dialogue is necessary. Marxists and Christians cannot proclaim their unique message to contemporary people unless they do it in dialogue with those who have differently oriented ways of understanding human beings. Thus the resources of both can be used for the development of humanity. Paul Oestreicher has said:

Christian Marxist dialogue is not essentially an activity in which the ‘goodies’ talk to the ‘baddies’. In theory it is a dialogue between two groups of ‘goodies’, each with a particular type of insight into the nature of truth. In practice it is a dialogue between ‘baddies’ who historically have often betrayed their own vision.

Thus Marxists and Christians should acknowledge their sins of omission and practice metanoia. Marxist - Christian dialogue should be based on this metanoia.
Charles Savage points out the error in Marxist and Christian positions in these words:

Were we to caricature the traditional position of the Christians and the Marxists we might say: Christianity proclaimed a new heaven, but forgot about a new earth; while Marxism proclaimed a new earth, but forgot a new heaven.12

Dialogue’s purpose is to overcome these dual errors. It is an example of living together in the emerging pluralistic world society. It is a way of seeking truth. As Nicolas Berdyaev expressed his strong conviction; truth cannot be imprisoned in any social net, socialist or capitalist, and . . . those who pursue the knowledge of truth step tiresomely and boldly out of neat prisons into worlds that have more to them than sociology or science could ever contain.13

Marxists and Christians should meet as people concerned with the questions and problems faced by humanity, to think and act together as human beings. The initiative for this can come either from Christians or from Marxists. Where other initiatives do not exist the Christians should take the initiative, both as members of humanity and as those who have experienced the redeeming love of God in Jesus Christ.

The dialogue does not imply the weakening or giving up of conflicting positions. Dialogue must be conceived and nurtured as the one viable method for dealing with ideological and social conflict; its only alternatives are isolation or annihilation. And yet we engage in dialogue not out of fear, nor as a diplomacy for human survival. As Harvey Cox said:

Even if there were no nuclear threat Christians and Communists should be conversing. We should converse not just to avoid death but to affirm life. Life is by its very nature dialogical and dialectical. This is the real reason for dialogue.14

The aim of such a dialogue is to develop both the conflicting positions according to their own respective logic and impulse, to help the Marxist to become more truly Marxist and the Christian to become more truly Christian by mutual questioning and challenge and by collaboration in the interest of mankind, wherever this is possible. A dialogue of this kind has only one necessary presupposition, a common conviction of the essential oneness and final victory of truth; and therefore openness, expectation and readiness to learn. The dialogue is necessary in order to clarify positions, to reaffirm the common humanity of all and to open oneself up to the possible truth in another’s position. As Reuel Howe rightly pointed out:

> The truth of each needs to be brought into relation with the truth of others in order that the full dimension of the truth each has may be made known. Such is the task of dialogue.15

Dialogue has certain prior assumptions. Respect for the other, willingness to learn and change when necessary are basic necessities. The suggestion that Christians should be willing to change may cause some anxiety, but it may be that we go a step further in grasping "the breadth and length and height and depth" (Eph. 3:8) of the divine love in Christ by confronting Him in the brother for whom He died. As Social Democrat, Gustav Heinemann of West Germany, a prominent lay Christian, said: "Christ did not die against Karl Marx."16 What Heinemann implied was that Christ died for Marx, as He died for every other person. God who used the Philistines to teach the Israelites a lesson can also use Marxists of our time to speak to us. Both Marxists and Christians live under the sovereign lordship of Christ, though Marxists may not heed to this idea.

Dialogue is not intended to suppress our differences or to abdicate one’s own position. Rather the purpose is to discover how the opposition can be a dynamic force for genuine human existence and development, and not to see differences as obstacles to cooperation, co-existence, or even pro-existence. As Milan Opocensky remarked: "We need a dialogue with Marxists for our own spiritual growth and development, as they need us."17

Marxist-Christian dialogue should not be confined to philosophical or doctrinal issues, although dialogue on these issues will always be necessary. Genuine dialogue can never be confined to conversations between that small group of philosophers and theologians who might presume to represent entire communities of men. We also need a life of dialogue for the fulfillment of common task in the world. It is true only part of that task can be common. There are certain elements like the proclamation of the Gospel and the sacramental worship of God which Christians are unable to share with Marxists. But our responsibility to transform the world in accordance with the purposes of God is one that we share with all men of goodwill. The immediate problems of world-hunger, population explosion, illiteracy, pollution, energy, the spiritual confusion of our day, etc. demand an end to the hurling of condemnation and pronouncing of mutual anathemas. The church must be ready to witness to the lordship of Christ by cooperating with men of goodwill who are genuinely concerned to seek better ways of living and working -- no matter what their political, social, or philosophical convictions.

Thus it is a foolish way of raising the question whether Marxists and Christians should first achieve a certain consensus about philosophical issues and then secondarily apply that consensus in the social realm, or whether Marxists and Christians must first be engaged in the struggle for peace and justice in the world in order to achieve that common philosophical perspective. Both inquiries go hand in hand. The church must be prepared to enter into common cause with any group, regardless of caste, color or creed, in the task of restoring meaning and purpose to human life, under whatever rubric this task might be conceived, whether it be called salvation or liberation, redemption or humanization. This means that the church needs to be present in trade unions, political parties, and every other secular institution to promote justice and compassion. In this way ordinary men and women who are engaged in the actual life-situations participate in the dialogue. These life-situations are the places where our metanoia is tested. If we are afraid of cooperation with Marxists or people of other faiths because the existence of the church is thereby threatened we are of little faith, for then we do not believe in the power of the living God, but we judge instead by human standards. Faith in the living God who is lord of the world and of the church knows no fear concerning the future of the church. To a certain extent we can even endorse much of the Marxist drive toward secularization and humanization. But the basis for this endorsement is not a subscription to Marxist ideology, but that Christology which we recognized earlier in this study. Thus by our attitude of responsibility for the transformation of society and concern for others, we help to set the stage in which Gods Word can speak freely to man.
As we enter into dialogue both Marxists and Christians have to heed a specific caution. Marxists and Christians are not the only people needed in this dialogue; what is needed is a truly interdisciplinary approach. Not only must we invite the insights of other religions and political orientations, but the moral disciplines of religion and politics must also seek the wisdom of those disciplines of the arts and sciences. All must avoid the illusion that problems can be solved by any sort of clique, whether this be the Marxist - Christian clique or the scientist- Christian clique. Nor will solutions proceed from the simple reduction of differences. The solutions required by the real world must go beyond the mechanical harmonization of theoretical similarities. They must have a transcendent dimension. There are thousands of problems to be approached in humility, openness, sincerity and in willingness to learn. In short, Marxist - Christian dialogue is only a part of the church’s dialogue with the world. Exhorting the church to a genuine encounter with the world, Schillebeeckx says:

The Church does not simply have something to communicate. In order to communicate, she must also receive from and listen to what comes to her from the world as "foreign prophecy", but in which she none the less recognizes the well-known voice of her Lord. The relationship between the Church and the world is thus no longer the relationship of a matching Church to a ‘learning’ world, but the interrelationship of dialogue in which both make a mutual contribution and listen sincerely to each other. 19

As Bonhoeffer has reminded us, it is wrong to presume that only Christianity has the answers to human problems. But in all humility and sincerity Christians can join with others in seeking solutions to human problems, trusting in the lord of the world whom they encounter in Jesus Christ and in their fellow human beings.

Let us conclude this study by repeating two quotations from Bonhoeffer which best summarize his thoughts, and which direct our encounter with Marxism.

To be a Christian does not mean to be religious in a particular way, to make something of oneself (a sinner, a penitent, or a saint) on the basis of some method or other, but to be a man not a type of man, but the man that Christ creates in us. It is not the religious act that makes the Christian, but participation in the sufferings of God in the secular life. That is metanoia: not in the first place thinking about one’s own needs, problems, sins, and fears, but allowing oneself to be caught up into the way of Jesus Christ.²⁰

. . . it is only by living completely in this world that one learns to have faith. One must completely abandon any attempt to make something of oneself, whether it be a saint, or a converted sinner, or a churchman (a so-called priestly type!), a religious man or an unrighteous one, a sick man or a healthy one. By this-worldliness I mean living unreservedly in life’s duties, problems, successes and failures, experiences and perplexities. In so doing we throw ourselves completely into the arms of God, taking seriously, not our own sufferings, but those of God in the world-watching with Christ in Gethsemane. That, I think, is faith; that is metanoia; and that is how one becomes a man and a Christian.²¹

Notes:

3. Ibid.

9. Ibid., p.5.

